The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the votes by which the foregoing bills were passed was ordered to be laid on the table.

FREE HIGHWAY BRIDGE ACROSS FOX RIVER AT GENEVA, ILL.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar (H. R. 8236) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois to reconstruct a free highway bridge across the Fox River at Geneva, in Kane County, State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS FOX RIVER NEAR M'HENRY, ILL.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 8237, granting the consent of Congress to the State of Illinois to construct a free highway bridge across the Fox River 5½ miles south of McHenry, in McHenry County, State of Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF PURCHASE MONEY ON HOMESTEAD ENTRIES, CHEYENNE RIVER AND STANDING ROCK INDIAN RESERVATIONS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 489, to amend the act of April 25, 1922, as amended, entitled "An act authorizing extensions of time for the payment of purchase money due under certain homestead entries and Government-land purchases within the former Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, N. Dak. and S. Dak."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the purpose of this bill is to extend the period of payment two years, where the original extension was dated for 1930, but the bill now provides for the corroborating affidavits of two witnesses. Why is that necessary when it was not necessary in the original bill?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It is necessary because we think there has been some abuse in getting these extensions, and the department, in order that it might be stopped in the future, has requested that this amendment be placed on the bill, so as to have evidence to corroborate the affidavit showing that the applicant is unable to pay his installment when due.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This is simply a small installment on the land?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And we are putting the occupants of the land in the position of filing corroborative affidavits in these days when we are so liberal in giving money in other quarters without requiring corroborating witnesses?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I may say that I drafted the original bill, which did not contain that provision.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why not strike it out of here?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. If it is stricken out, we can just strike out the provision relating to these corroborative affidavits. I do not think they should be required.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not think so, either, and I shall so move.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior any entryman or purchaser of ceded Cheyenne River and Standing Rock Indian lands who is unable to make payment as required by the act of March 31, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 400), as amended, may obtain an extension of time not to exceed two years in addition to the extensions now authorized by law: Provided, That no extension shall be granted without payment of interest for one year in advance upon any installment or installments so extended.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "Provided," strike out "That no extension shall be granted without payment of interest for one year in advance upon any installment or installments so extended" and insert "That no extension of time shall be granted to any homesteader or purchaser who fails to pay interest in advance on the total amount involved at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, and to file an affidavit corroborated by the affidavits of two persons setting out his inability to pay the amount required by existing law."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: In line 7, page 2, after the word "annum," strike out the comma and insert a period and strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the proposed amendment to the amendment.

Unfortunately I was not giving enrapt attention to the colloquy indulged in between the gentleman from New York and the author of the bill as to the proposed amendment, and I did not hear the statement of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON] as to the reason for the necessity of the affidavits of those two persons. The department, I believe, recommends that that should be included, so that there will be no one who will use this law merely as a ruse, when he would be in a position to pay the installment. What is the objection of the gentleman as to the provision recommended by the department?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The original bill provides for an extension of time from 1930. This bill simply amends the original bill by providing a 2-year extension. It occurred to me that this requirement of two affidavits of corroborating witnesses, which was not included in the original bill, should not be required at this time. After all, the homesteader or occupant of the land, who owes this installment, must pay the interest, and it seems to me he is in a position to make his own statement and that we should not put him to the difficulty of going around peddling himself trying to get these additional affidavits. It is discretional.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING ACT PROVIDING COMPENSATION FOR EMPLOYEES OF THE UNITED STATES SUFFERING INJURIES

The Clerk called the next bill on the Consent Calendar, H. R. 92, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, and acts in amendment thereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, just what does this amendment do?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can tell the gentleman. It takes over a few cases that now are drawing full compensation from the Government, who are totally blind or who have lost hands or both feet and they require an attendant, and it allows them $50 a month more for that attendant.

Mr. GILBERT. I wish to say that the department that is administering this law administers it in conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and it is necessary to pass special acts here at times to have people allowed compensation, when, if the department would follow the decisions of the Supreme Court, we would be saved that necessity.

I have asked for this information fearing that the amendment had something to do with that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I have always thought the United States Employees' Compensation Commission was very ably conducted by Mrs. Brueggeman. The reports which we get in our committee from that commission are always very well drawn. They state the facts clearly and the law correctly.

Mr. GILBERT. The commission is very ably but very strictly administered. The commission declines to allow compensation in cases where the courts say it should be allowed. I have had to sponsor special acts to secure relief where the commission admitted that the courts would allow it. This department should at least follow the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I sympathize with the gentleman in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give further consideration to this measure; and, therefore, I ask unanimous consent that it may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

COLORADO SCHOOL OF MINES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 231, to grant certain lands to the State of Colorado for the benefit of the Colorado School of Mines.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to the State of Colorado patent conveying title to the south half southeast quarter section 22; the north half northeast quarter, and the southwest quarter northwest quarter section 27, township 18 south, range 66 west, sixth principal meridian, Colorado, for the use and benefit of the Colorado School of Mines located at Golden, upon payment to the United States of $1.25 per acre therefor: Provided, That there is found to be no conflicting valid claim to the lands so described: And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits found at any time in the land, together with the right of the United States, its grantees or permittees, to prospect for, mine, and remove such deposits, under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE MILITARY AND NONMILITARY ACTIVITIES OF THE WAR DEPARTMENT

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8330, regulating the use of appropriations for the military and nonmilitary activities of the War Department.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS], who introduced this bill, is not present. I ask unanimous consent that it may be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESTORATION OF CERTAIN LANDS TO THE SAN CARLOS INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8824, to restore certain lands to the San Carlos (White Mountain) Indian Reservation, Ariz.

There being no objection, the bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the tract of land in the State of Arizona ceded by the San Carlos Indians to the United States by an agreement with said Indians dated February 25, 1896, ratified by the act of June 10, 1896 (29 Stat. L. 358), identified as beginning at the angle point on the southern boundary of the present San Carlos (White Mountain) Indian Reservation, as surveyed by Deputy Surveyor Philip Contzen in 1898, in approximate latitude 33 degrees 2 minutes north and longitude 110 degrees and 2 minutes west, 3 miles 45 33/100 chains south of the Gila River; thence south along the then boundary of the White Mountain Indian Reservation as surveyed by Deputy Surveyor Paul Riecker in 1883, 11 miles 34 67/100 chains, to the angle point established by Deputy Riecker 15 miles south of the Gila River; thence westerly along the then southern boundary of the reservation as surveyed by Deputy Riecker in 1883, 45 miles 33 6/100 chains, to the angle point established by him at the terminus of said southern boundary; thence north along the then boundary of the reservation as surveyed by Deputy Riecker in 1883, 15 miles, to the Gila River, at a point 10 miles upstream from its confluence with the San Pedro River; thence up the middle of the Gila River, northeasterly, to the southern boundary of the present San Carlos (White Mountain) Indian Reservation; thence easterly along the present boundary of said reservation to the point of beginning, containing approximately 363 square miles, be, and the same is hereby, restored to and made a part of the San Carlos (White Mountain) Indian Reservation: Provided, That such lands within the above-described area as are now within the Crook National Forest are hereby eliminated from said national forest and restored to the San Carlos (White Mountain) Indian Reservation: Provided further, That any valid rights or claims against such lands initiated prior to March 30, 1931, shall not be affected by this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

WREATH ON GRAVE OF THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

The next business on the Consent Calendar was the resolution (H. Con. Res. 19) providing a wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington on February 22, 1932.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Clerk of the Senate of the United States and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized to purchase a wreath to be placed on the grave of Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va., on the 22d day of February, 1932, that day being the two hundredth anniversary of the birth of Gen. George Washington, the cost of said wreath not to exceed $50, which shall be paid proportionately out of the contingent funds of the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives, respectively; be it further

Resolved, That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives are hereby authorized to appoint, respectively, a Member of the Senate of the United States and a Member of the House of Representatives, both or either of whom on behalf of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, shall, at the time and place aforesaid, place said wreath on the grave of Mary, the mother of Washington.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES OF FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass with amendments the bill (H. R. 9203) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 9203, with amendments. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by inserting, between sections 10 and 11 thereof, a new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 10. (a) Upon receiving the consent of not less than a majority of the Federal Reserve Board, any Federal reserve bank may make advances, for a period not exceeding one year from the date of the approval of this act, in such amount as the board of directors of such Federal reserve bank may determine to groups of five or more independently owned and controlled member banks within its district upon their time or demand promissory notes: Provided, That such banks have no adequate amount of eligible and acceptable assets to obtain sufficient accommodation through rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank. The liability of the individual banks in each group must be limited to such proportion of the total amount advanced to such group as the deposit liability of the respective banks bears to the aggregate deposit liability of all banks in such group. Such banks shall be authorized to distribute the proceeds of such loans to such of their number and in such amount as they may agree upon, but before so doing they shall require such recipient banks to deposit with a suitable trustee, representing the entire group, their individual notes made in favor of the group protected by such collateral security as may be agreed upon. Any Federal reserve bank making such advance shall charge interest or discount thereon at a rate not less than 1 per cent above its discount rate in effect at the time of making such advance. No such note upon which advances are made by a Federal reserve bank under this section shall be eligible under section 16 of this act as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

"No obligations of any foreign government, individual, partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws thereof shall be eligible as collateral security for advances under this section.

"Member banks are authorized to obligate themselves in accordance with the provisions of this section."

SEC. 2. The Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by adding, immediately after such new section 10 (a), an additional new section reading as follows:

"SEC. 10. (b) In exceptional and exigent circumstances and for a period not exceeding one year from the date of the approval of this act, and when any member bank has no further eligible and acceptable assets available to enable it to obtain adequate credit accommodations from the Federal reserve bank through rediscounting or any other method provided by this act other than that provided by section 10 (a), any Federal reserve bank, pursuant to affirmative action by not less than a majority of the Federal Reserve Board, may make advances to such member bank on its time or demand promissory notes secured to the satisfaction of such Federal reserve bank: Provided, That (1) each such note shall bear interest at a rate not less than 1 per cent per annum higher than the highest discount rate in effect at such Federal reserve bank on the date of such note; (2) the Federal Reserve Board may by regulation limit and define the classes of assets which may be accepted as security for advances made under authority of this section; and (3) no note accepted for any such advance shall be eligible as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

"No obligations of any foreign government, individual, partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws thereof shall be eligible as collateral security for advances under this section."

SEC. 3. The second paragraph of section 16 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances acquired under the provisions of section 13 of this act, or bills of exchange indorsed by a member bank of any Federal reserve district and purchased under the provisions of section 14 of this act, or bankers' acceptances purchased under the provisions of said section 14, or gold or gold certificates: Provided, however, That at any time within 12 months from the date of the approval of this act, should the Federal Reserve Board deem it in the public interest, it may, upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members, authorize the Federal reserve banks to offer, and the Federal reserve agents to accept, as such collateral security, direct obligations of the United States. At the expiration of one year from the approval of this act, or sooner should the Federal Reserve Board so decide, such authorization shall terminate and such obligations of the United States be retired as security for Federal reserve notes. In no event shall such collateral security be less than the amount of Federal reserve notes applied for. The Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it."

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to ask unanimous consent that additional time be given for debate? The Chair asks this for the reason that a number of gentlemen have requested, in view of the fact the session of the House will run until 5 o'clock, that the gentleman ask for one hour of additional debate, so the House may have as full opportunity as possible to discuss the measure.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended one hour in addition to the original request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for one hour and a half, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania for one hour and a half.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this bill represents the culmination of a demand that has been manifest on the Democratic side of the House, and which has grown from day to day since the meeting of the Congress last December.

A similar bill, in principle, has been before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House for some weeks in the form of a measure introduced by the able and distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], and other bills of similar purpose and principle, one of which was introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER], who is a student of economic questions and whose views are held in high regard. There have been extended conferences and discussions from time to time with the chairman of the committee and members of the committee, and other Members of the House with reference to the legislation.

We undertook to cooperate with the administration in legislation suggested at the outset of the labors of this session and we have given right of way to legislation supported by the administration. Majority members of the Banking and Currency Committee found themselves agreed in principle with reference to legislation to enlarge the facilities of the Federal reserve system.

Conferences have been held by the chairman of the committee with members of his party in the Senate, with whom, also, we were able to agree. I should add that this demand for legislation of this kind has come from some Members on the other side of the aisle. It is fair to say, however, that the demand from the minority side was by no means so widespread.

Last week leading members of the administration came to an agreement that this legislation was desirable. The bill before us embodies, in substance, the provisions of the measures that have been pending before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House to which I have alluded, and, in part, it is taken from a measure pending in the Senate, a bill of much wider range, amending various features of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is that the Glass bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes; I refer to the bill known as the Glass bill, introduced by the distinguished Senator from Virginia. One provision was taken from his bill.

There has been an additional provision incorporated along with the two provisions to which I have referred. Those of us who are really for this legislation do not think it is a cure-all or that it is going to relieve entirely the unfortunate conditions that exist at this time; but many of us do believe, as we have long believed, that it will enlarge and extend the service of the Federal reserve system and bring that great system back into the channels in which it was placed at the beginning and again serve the country as it did for quite a time when we enjoyed an unparalleled period of prosperity under that great legislative enactment. The Federal reserve act was the achievement of a Democratic administration. It is an amendment to that act which we offer now in the hope of bringing relief from present distress.

The banking and credit machinery of this country has drifted into unhappy days. I am not going to attempt here to review the history of the developments in this connection, but I want in justice to some members of the committee with whom I have served to state that some of us for years have warned the country of what was taking place; we have pleaded with those who had the power to change the policies under which we were acting, that the country might be saved from a collapse of the banking system of the Nation. It would have been an easy thing to construct legislation to prevent the things that have happened.

A much larger task confronts us now, after all the disasters that have come upon us, many of them, I honestly believe, as a result of vicious and unsound banking practices on the part of those who were relied upon for leadership in the banking world. The indefensible practices that have wrought these misfortunes upon us were carried on either with the sanction—or without proper efforts to prevent them—on the part of those responsible for the Federal reserve system of the United States. [Applause.]

The big bankers who claimed a monopoly on wisdom and good morals in banking have taken the Federal reserve system and perverted and debased it. They turned it from service to legitimate business and commerce into an instrument for use in the promotion of speculation and international high finance by men who proved unworthy of the trusts reposed in them, and who have been shown to be as ignorant as they were known to be unscrupulous.

These men gathered junk from the four corners of the earth and fed it into the banks of this country to the wreck and ruin of thousands of such banks and their innocent depositors. The rights of small communities have been treated with contempt and, by unfair practices and unjust discriminatory rules and regulations of the Federal reserve system, the small banks of the United States have been strangled and choked to death. [Applause.]

The confidence of the public has been destroyed, and now we find the necessity that we must attempt to deal with actual economic difficulties; but, worse than that, we face the necessity of restoring the faith of the people in the banks, on which they have a right to rely as a safe place to deposit their earnings and the savings to be left for their loved ones. But I do not desire to make a long speech. I want to discuss the provisions of the bill and conclude in order to leave time for other Members.

Mr. BLANTON. Before the gentleman proceeds with that I want to ask him one question.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will yield to the gentleman. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas, but only for a brief question. I can not yield freely, as I should like to do.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman tell us if it is not a fact that since 1913, when the original act was passed, there have been 32 different amendments passed by Congress, in which the powers and scope and authority of the Federal reserve system have been increased, and in practically all of them our friend from Alabama has been on the floor fighting those amendments?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that I do not want to get to talking politics, but the Democrats of the Banking and Currency Committee have fought for years to bring the Federal reserve system back where it belongs and make it serve the business interests of the country which it was intended to serve. The Republican members of the committee know that some of us have walked the floor for years telling them that those in control were destroying the banking system of the United States. Gentlemen on that side of the aisle smile; but if you will look up the record of the hearings before our committee, you will see that these leaders in the banking world were continually telling us that small communities did not have brains enough to run a bank suitable to their demands and requirements. We have found out that the biggest dupes known to history were those very men who told us that small towns and communities could not supply officials who knew how to run a bank.

Mr. BLANTON. I have been a faithful follower of the gentleman from Alabama all these years, but let me ask him this further question. Is it not a fact that this particular bill is the conglomeration of the ideas of Eugene Meyer and Ogden Mills?

Mr. STEAGALL. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Have they not approved of the bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes. They have approved the bill, because the indefensible practices of the big banks have destroyed confidence on the part of the American people and brought us into such disasters that they feel that we are forced to resort to this remedy.

Mr. BLANTON. Let me say that I had rather follow the splendid leadership of my friend from Alabama as the ranking militant member of the minority of the Banking and Currency Committee than as chairman who cooperates with Eugene Meyer and Ogden Mills. [Laughter.]

Mr. STEAGALL. I will cooperate with anybody who is in position to aid in the effort to save the country from the horrible conditions that have been brought upon us. [Applause.] We need not worry about politics; we need have no fears that we shall suffer any political misfortune by serving the country without regard to party division.

Now, I want to talk about the provisions of this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I ask recognition for five minutes more.

Here is what we do. First, we provide that a group of banks, not less than five, may come together, form an organization or clearing house, and the Federal reserve banks may make loans to such group of banks upon their joint obligation.

The banks forming a group are required to put up collateral securities with a trustee to be selected by them, and they agree among themselves upon the security to be set up for their own protection. The Federal reserve bank makes the loan to the group, but shall not make it except upon the approval of a majority of the Federal Reserve Board. This authority is limited to a period of one year from the enactment of the bill. We further provide that no such loan shall be made on any security other than paper that is now recognized under the law as eligible at the Federal reserve bank, so long as the bankers composing the group have sufficient eligible security. It is also provided that no such loan shall be made upon foreign securities. In addition, the rate of interest required is 1 per cent higher than the prevailing rate. These are the safeguards that surround this provision. Section 2 of the bill provides that an individual bank may obtain loans from Federal reserve banks upon any security satisfactory to the bank, though not eligible under existing law. This also is to be permitted only for the period of one year from the passage of this act. The limitation is also applied that the individual bank can not obtain such a loan if it has in its portfolio paper that is now eligible under the Federal reserve law. If it has no such paper, the Federal reserve bank, with the approval of a majority of the Federal Reserve Board, is authorized to make a loan on any security that is satisfactory. A further limitation provides that the rate of interest shall be 1 per cent higher than the current rate. It is also provided, as in case of loans to groups of banks, that no loans shall be made to individual banks upon any foreign security, or upon the obligation or collateral growing out of foreign transactions. [Applause.]

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman tell us in a general way what classes of security are in mind which are not now eligible for discount, which will be made eligible for discount under this provision of section 2?

Mr. STEAGALL. All classes of securities except those that are based upon foreign obligations are eligible for loans if the Federal Reserve Board approves them and the Federal reserve bank sees fit to make them, provided the applying bank does not have collateral eligible as security under the general provisions of the Federal reserve act.

It makes it possible for a bank that finds itself in the midst of this confusion and distress and the state of fear that exists on the part of the public, where prudence and due regard for responsibility to its depositors, requires it to keep on hand enough liquid securities or eligible paper to respond to any contingency that may arise, to release its cash for use by the public to the extent that its borrowing power is enlarged. Many banks are afraid to let a day pass without having on hand cash or securities upon which they may realize on short notice sufficient to respond to any demands of their depositors. Any bank like that, that has any other valid and worthy security, is allowed under this bill to take it to the Federal reserve bank and borrow upon it, and when it does that, then you have released that much of credit for business activity and for productive pursuits, and for aid in the revival of business throughout the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield for an inquiry.

Mr. McKEOWN. A lot of telegrams are coming in——

Mr. STEAGALL. Please do not interrupt me to read a telegram. My time is too limited; of course I should be glad to yield if I had more time.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to ask the gentleman if this is the original Glass bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. The bill known as the Glass bill is an entirely different measure.

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman desire to ask a question at this particular point?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. SHANNON. Is the gentleman free to tell us, leaving out the profanity, just what Mr. Dawes said in the White House conference that brought about the absolute necessity of hurrying this measure through?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is what he said in the committee.

Mr. SHANNON. But I am talking about the White House conference.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it is not in the hearings.

Mr. SHANNON. The gentleman ought to report it to us; he ought to tell us what occurred.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yielded to the gentleman for an inquiry.

Mr. SHANNON. That is an inquiry.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman now yield me the floor in order to permit me to answer?

Mr. SHANNON. Yes; but leave out the profanity.

Mr. STEAGALL. I know that a man of the gentleman's brilliant mind and practical common sense and experience does not have to be told that there is a certain delicacy involved in the discussion of credit and banking that forbids that references to matters of that kind be published to the world, if we are to deal constructively with great and important affairs such as was before the Committee on Banking and Currency when the distinguished gentleman appeared before us. We did have before us a distinguished citizen of the United States and a member of the board of directors of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who discussed in a general way the conditions that had come to his attention in connection with his duties as a member of that board, and he went so far as to discuss before the committee individual instances in which the corporation had been applied to for aid. Does the gentleman think that good faith to this House and the country requires that I now repeat all that he said on those occasions?

Mr. SHANNON. Everything that pertains to the American people should be told to this body, their Representatives.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am sure the gentleman would modify that statement on reflection. I do not think we should go that far. Both political parties were represented on the committee when the hearings were held. The gentleman's side of the House was represented by a number of Members, and so was the other side. Men who are against this bill were represented and men who are for the bill. A request was made that the statements of one of the gentlemen who appeared before us should not be published to the country, and it has not been done. I thought the committee acted wisely in not publishing it. [Applause.] I think so yet. That is my judgment about that. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield for a question.

Mr. CELLER. Five banks may, by concert or cooperation, make application, provided they divest themselves of any eligible paper or do not have any more eligible paper for rediscount?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is quite right.

Mr. CELLER. Suppose there are two strong banks which want to come to the rescue of three weaker banks. Must those two strong banks bring themselves to the level of the weakness of the other three banks by divesting themselves of all rediscountable paper in order that they may in concert apply to the Federal reserve bank for relief?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is a problem to be worked out under the provisions of this bill by the men who form the group of bankers. It is their job to get together and put up such securities as they see fit to satisfy one another and then apply for a loan. But if they have eligible paper they should not be allowed to unload any other kind of paper on the Federal reserve system. The purpose of this legislation is to relieve emergencies——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. If they have this eligible paper, the two strong banks could use their own credit until that is exhausted, and then they could use this.

Mr. STEAGALL. Why, certainly. I will say to the gentleman that if the banks have eligible paper, liquid assets, such as is contemplated by the Federal reserve law, and want credit from the Federal reserve banks, good faith requires that they submit it instead of coming in and trying to offer something else which opportunity is afforded for merely as an emergency proposition. Now, I neglected to say that the section requires an interest rate of 1 per cent above the current rate.

Mr. CELLER. Those two strong banks I spoke of do not need aid, but they want to help three other banks, and in order to do that they must weaken themselves to the level of the other three.

Mr. STEAGALL. But the philosophy of that proposition rests upon the idea of cooperation among the member banks. If they can not agree among themselves, they can not come to the Federal reserve bank for their requirements. It is intended to aid banks that make proper effort to aid themselves.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does the period of limitation of one year relate to the maturity of the loan?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, no. It is provided that loans shall not be made after one year from the passage of the act.

Now, I wish to discuss one other provision of the bill, and I must conclude, as I have promised to yield time to others.

The third provision of the bill authorizes the Federal reserve banks to issue Federal reserve notes upon direct obligations of the Government, supported by 40 per cent of gold. Now, where is there any inflation in that, which should alarm anybody? The Federal reserve banks now issue currency based on commercial paper, supported by 40 per cent of gold. Is there any harm or is there anything unsound in substituting a Government bond for paper representing the debts of a community to a bank?

It was never required and never contemplated in the original Federal reserve law that it was necessary to maintain more than 40 per cent gold against notes issued, but we find ourselves in a situation during this depression where commercial credits have been cut down, and commercial paper offered at the Federal reserve banks is curtailed until they are now carrying twice the amount of gold against notes issued that the law ever contemplated. The notes are outstanding, and they must put up gold because they have not sufficient commercial paper to cover the issue of notes. So we have authorized them to substitute Government bonds. Now, that will release some seven hundred and fifty millions to one billion dollars in gold. This will strengthen the Federal reserve system. It will strengthen our position financially all along the line, and it does not make possible any undue inflation of the currency of the country.

It makes possible expansion, not a wild inflation, but sufficient expansion to counteract the horrible deflationary policies and practices in which we find ourselves engulfed at this time in the United States. [Applause.] That is what we are trying to do. That is all there is in this provision respecting note issues by the Federal reserve banks. It is not a wild scheme. It is to be kept under the control of the Federal Reserve Board. The provision is limited in operation to a period of one year. We could not inflate to any dangerous extent so long as the gold requirement is retained. I will say also, in this connection, that if the Federal Reserve Board is to be judged by its conduct in the past, nobody need fear that we are in for a wild period of inflation through the operation of this law, so long as it is under the control of the Federal Reserve Board of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG].

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to no politics in connection with the passage of this bill. It has been suggested by the President and the financial heads of the Government, and has been studied by our committee on Banking and Currency and favorably reported to this House by a vote of 20 to 1 because of a public necessity. I am supporting it because I believe it is needed to break down the reign of fear in financial matters that exists throughout the entire United States.

We recently passed legislation creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. That will do great good, but we have found that throughout the United States there is an existing state of fear of the future. Hoarding is going on. Men and women are going to the banks and taking out the money and putting it into safe deposit boxes or taking it home and hiding it. Deposits are being withdrawn. Banks fear their depositors may demand their money and they will not make loans needed in business and agriculture; they think a run may come upon them or their neighbor bank and they want to keep every dollar they have in their vaults. But there is a condition that is even worse than that. Banks that have eligible paper are not borrowing on it. They are holding it. There is no Federal reserve bank in this country which is borrowing anything like the money it is permitted to borrow on the eligible paper it has in its vaults. Why? Because it fears a run may come in its territory and it wants that paper to use if necessary. There are three billions of dollars worth of eligible paper in the banks of this country that are not being used for rediscounting.

If banks holding such eligible paper would take it to the Federal reserve banks and borrow money on it and then make loans to the people engaged in business, industry, and agriculture, who need it and who have good security for it, we would not need this bill. But they are not doing it. They are not doing it for the same reason that the individual is not loaning money. They are not doing it because they fear a financial panic.

The purpose of this bill is to dispel such fear, restore confidence, and again make it possible to carry on business in a normal way.

One of the provisions of the bill is to widen the scope of eligible paper, so that the eligible paper that is now being hoarded—and I am going to let that word stand—in the banks of this country may be extended, increased by other securities, perfectly good but not now eligible paper; then the Federal reserve banks may accept such security and furnish funds to make loans so badly needed. It may be security on real estate, State bonds, county, or city bonds, or any good security that is offered them that they believe to be good. That will make it possible for the little banks throughout the country, if they have not eligible paper, to use such paper though not now eligible for rediscount but yet safe; and on that paper they can secure credit. That will turn loose a vast amount of credit throughout the country. It will make the little banks and the big banks realize that they are not going to be crowded for their deposits.

Then it will do another thing. It will permit the banks that have no eligible paper to get together and guarantee each other's paper. It will permit clearing-house certificates to be issued. It will make it possible to establish rules in the cities that will stop this hoarding.

It will do a third thing. It will turn loose about $800,000,000 of free gold. There is behind our currency of about $3,000,000,000, secured by $900,000,000 of eligible paper and $2,000,000,000 of gold, because they are holding on to the eligible paper and they are putting up gold. By permitting the use of Government bonds as a basis for the issue of currency, as provided in this bill, it will release between $750,000,000 and $800,000,000 in gold, and you all know what that will do. Eight hundred million dollars, my friends, will produce $2,000,000,000 worth of credit in this country.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman think the additional credit that will be provided by this bill will have a tendency to increase the general commodity price level?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is not going to be embarrassing to me, because I will frankly say to the gentleman that I think it will; yes. I have for six years been pleading for legislation that will make it possible to increase the volume of money of this country when the general commodity price level is falling and to regulate the amount of money in circulation among the people in order to bring about a stable dollar, so I am now very much delighted with this increase in currency and credit which will be turned loose. When it is in circulation it will increase, I have no doubt, the general commodity price level so much needed to restore business and prosperity. My hope is that we will then pass legislation that will maintain such stability.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman is hopeful, then, that the Federal Reserve Board will, in the administration of these provisions, at least have an eye toward the general commodity price level, with a view of rehabilitating the price of commodities in this country at somewhere near normal?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not know that they will have their eyes turned toward the price level or not, but they ought to. However, they have got to turn loose both money and credit in order to bring about a normal condition of prices.

Mr. BURTNESS. In view of the additional safeguards put into this bill with reference to these provisions, why was it necessary to limit this authority to one year? Personally, I regret that limitation, at least, in so far as sections 2 and 3 of the bill are concerned.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I thought so myself, but a majority of the committee thought that was wise and we were governed by the majority.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. If this condition exists a year from now, Congress can easily extend the time.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That was the argument, that if when this one year was over and conditions necessitated it, Congress would then be in session and the time could easily be extended.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. This is a good bill, but why did not the gentleman's side bring it in over a year ago?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Why did not your side bring it in? What is the use of playing peanut politics with a thing like this? [Applause.] My friends, I do not appeal to you as Democrats or Republicans. I want to appeal to you as representatives of the great American people to go along and pass this bill, and let us try to get out of the condition we have been in. Do not say that a Republican proposed it or that a Democrat favored it. Let us say the American Congress, composed of the representatives of the people, passed this legislation in order to dispel fear and restore confidence and to bring about the prosperity we all so much desire.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. The third important feature of this bill is that the Federal reserve banks can issue currency against Government securities to an extent not to exceed an amount where there will not be less than 40 per cent of gold to back up the issue that is made.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is correct.

Mr. PARSONS. What is the difference in principle and what is the difference in the responsibility of the Federal Government if the Government did it direct rather than through the Federal reserve system?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Well, simply because we have set up the Federal reserve system and it is functioning in that capacity. Then, too, this is the easiest way to pass legislation to bring about desired results.

Mr. PARSONS. The Federal Government could issue $1,000,000,000 in currency, and it would be just the same as if the Federal reserve banks had issued it, and the Federal Government could do it without interest.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If you want to go ahead with fiat money, all right.

Mr. PARSONS. If that is fiat money, is not the currency issued by the Federal reserve system fiat money?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No; it is based upon eligible paper, but always there must be 40 per cent of gold.

Mr. PARSONS. With the Federal Government directly issuing it, would it not have against it no less than 40 per cent of gold?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes; but there must also be the eligible paper. Every American dollar now is worth one dollar's worth of gold, and anyone can receive a dollar's worth of gold for it. We want to stay on the gold basis, and we will do this if you pass this bill.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. We have about four and a half billion dollars in gold at present; how much of gold certificates has been issued against the four billion and a half of gold in the Treasury?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I do not know.

Mr. PARSONS. Certainly not more than four and a half billion?

Mr. BEEDY. If the gentleman will yield, I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The gentleman from Maine states that he can answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. BEEDY. There is $877,000,000 of yellow backs out now.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this most important measure is not before the House under the ordinary rules which would permit it to be safeguarded by proper amendments. It is called up under a suspension of the rules and has to be passed just as it has been proposed by the committee, and not one of the 435 Members of this House can propose a single amendment to it. It can not be amended in any particular. We have to vote for it just as it is, without the changing of a dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

If we had not besieged the Speaker and the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], who is chairman of the committee, with urgent requests for more time for debate, we would have been limited to 20 minutes to the side to debate this most important piece of legislation, for 40 minutes is all the time allowed for debate under suspension of the rules.

And the colloquy that ensued between the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] and the chairman evidenced the fact that the general provisions and purposes of this bill were unknown to the membership. Is it possible that the committee can not trust the membership of this House to pass on this bill? Is it so perfect that it needs no amending?

Mr. Speaker, we have since 1913, or since the passage of the Federal reserve act, passed 32 amendments to that act. Practically every one of them came from the Federal reserve system seeking an enlargement of its powers. I found myself following the militant lead of my good friend from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] when he opposed many of these amendments. He made some magnificent debates on this floor during those fights, and it is hard for me now to follow him in a lead that is actuated by the head of this whole system, collaborating with our friend, Hon. Ogden Mills, the present Secretary of the Treasury. I want to call your attention to these various amendments, and to some excerpts from the act.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to quote excerpts from the Federal reserve act, and from the 1930 report of the Federal Reserve Board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BLAND). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to call attention to these different amendments. Since we passed the Federal reserve act which was approved on December 23, 1913, Congress has passed 32 amendments to such act, and I now give the Congress, the date approved, and the public law these amendments became, to wit:

Mr. Speaker, I now want to quote some excerpts from the provisions of the Federal reserve act of 1913 to show how much the Government has done for this system, and just how much the Federal Government is a part of it. From section 2 I quote the following excerpts, to wit:

SEC. 2. As soon as practicable, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency, acting as the reserve bank organization committee, shall designate not less than 8 nor more than 12 cities to be known as Federal reserve cities, and shall divide the continental United States, excluding Alaska, into districts—

And so forth.

Said organization committee shall be authorized to employ counsel and expert aid, to take testimony, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to make such investigation as may be deemed necessary by the said committee in determining the reserve districts and in designating the cities within such districts where such Federal reserve banks shall be severally located. The said committee shall supervise the organization in each of the cities designated of a Federal reserve bank, which shall include in its title the name of the city in which it is situated—

* * * * * * *

Should the total subscriptions by banks and the public to the stock of said Federal reserve banks, or any one or more of them, be, in the judgment of the organization committee, insufficient to provide the amount of capital required therefor, then and in that event the said organization committee shall allot to the United States such an amount of said stock as said committee shall determine. Said United States stock shall be paid for at par out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury and disposed of for the benefit of the United States in such manner, at such times, and at such price, not less than par, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine.

* * * * * * *

The organization committee shall have power to appoint such assistants and incur such expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act as it shall deem necessary, and such expenses shall be payable by the Treasurer of the United States upon voucher approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the sum of $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of such expenses.

Mr. Speaker, I want my colleagues to note that the organization committee above referred to is the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States, and the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States, all paid big salaries by the people of the United States.

I now quote the following from section 7 of said act:

DIVISION OF EARNINGS

SEC. 7. After all necessary expenses of a Federal reserve bank have been paid or provided for, the stockholders shall be entitled to receive an annual dividend of 6 per cent on the paid-in capital stock, which dividend shall be cumulative. After the aforesaid dividend claims have been fully met, all the net earnings shall be paid to the United States as a franchise tax, except that one-half of such net earnings shall be paid into a surplus fund until it shall amount to 40 per cent of the paid-in capital stock of such bank.

The net earnings derived by the United States from Federal reserve banks shall, in the discretion of the Secretary, be used to supplement the gold reserve held against outstanding United States notes, or shall be applied to the reduction of the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the United States under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. Should a Federal reserve bank be dissolved or go into liquidation, any surplus remaining after the payment of all debts, dividend requirements as hereinbefore provided, and the par value of the stock, shall be paid to and become the property of the United States and shall be similarly applied.

Federal reserve banks, including the capital stock and surplus therein, and the income derived therefrom shall be exempt from Federal, State, and local taxation, except taxes upon real estate.

Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that when expenses of the Federal reserve banks are mentioned, same are designated by Congress as "necessary expenses." It makes no mention of extravagant and wasteful expenditures. And it was not contemplated by Congress that there should be extravagant and wasteful expenditures.

And you will note that the people of the United States are interested in the expenses of this system, for the act provides that after "necessary expenses" are paid, and the annual dividend of 6 per cent is distributed, "all of the net earnings shall be paid to the United States as a franchise tax." Thus the net earnings that are to go into the Treasury of the United States are large or small, according to the expenses being only the "necessary" ones or the earnings being paid out in extravagant and wasteful expenditures. So the people of the United States are interested. And Representatives in Congress are interested in the manner in which these Federal reserve banks conduct their business. And we, as Representatives of the people, have the inherent right to know just how they conduct their business. And I am going to make it some of my business to know all about how they conduct their business. Let me quote further from section 10 of said act:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD

SEC. 10. A Federal Reserve Board is hereby created which shall consist of seven members, including the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, who shall be members ex officio, and five members appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. In selecting the five appointive members of the Federal Reserve Board, not more than one of whom shall be selected from any one Federal reserve district, the President shall have due regard to a fair representation of the different commercial, industrial, and geographical divisions of the country. The five members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President and confirmed as aforesaid shall devote their entire time to the business of the Federal Reserve Board and shall each receive an annual salary of $12,000, payable monthly together with actual necessary traveling expenses, and the Comptroller of the Currency, as ex officio member of the Federal Reserve Board, shall, in addition to the salary now paid him as Comptroller of the Currency, receive the sum of $7,000 annually for his services as a member of said board.

Mr. Speaker, it will be noted that the five members of the Federal Reserve Board appointed by the President of the United States receive a salary of only $12,000, limited by Congress, and that the Comptroller of the Currency receives $7,000 per annum additional to his salary for the extra services he renders to this Federal reserve system.

Section 2 of this act authorizes this Federal Reserve Board—the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency of the United States being members thereof—to—

(a) To examine at its discretion the accounts, books, and affairs of each Federal reserve bank and of each member bank and to require such statements and reports as it may deem necessary.

* * * * * * *

(h) To suspend, for the violation of any of the provisions of this act, the operations of any Federal reserve bank, to take possession thereof, administer the same during the period of suspension, and, when deemed advisable, to liquidate or reorganize such bank.

* * * * * * *

(l) To employ such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, or other employees as may be deemed necessary to conduct the business of the board. All salaries and fees shall be fixed in advance by said board and shall be paid in the same manner as the salaries of the members of said board. All such attorneys, experts, assistants, clerks, and other employees shall be appointed without regard to the provisions of the act of January 16, 1883 (22 Stat. L. 403), and amendments thereto, or any rule or regulation made in pursuance thereof: Provided, That nothing herein shall prevent the President from placing said employees in the classified service.

OPEN-MARKET OPERATIONS

SEC. 14. Any Federal reserve bank may, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, purchase and sell in the open market, at home or abroad, either from or to domestic or foreign banks, firms, corporations, or individuals, cable transfers and bankers' acceptances and bills of exchange of the kinds and maturities by this act made eligible for rediscount, with or without the indorsement of a member bank.

Every Federal reserve bank shall have power:

(a) To deal in gold coin and bullion at home or abroad, to make loans thereon, exchange Federal reserve notes for gold, gold coin, or gold certificates, and to contract for loans of gold coin or bullion, giving therefor, when necessary, acceptable security, including the hypothecation of United States bonds or other securities which Federal reserve banks are authorized to hold;

(b) To buy and sell, at home or abroad, bonds and notes of the United States, and bills, notes, revenue bonds, and warrants with a maturity from date of purchase of not exceeding six months, issued in anticipation of the collection of taxes or in anticipation of the receipt of assured revenues by any State, county, district, political subdivision, or municipality in the continental United States, including irrigation, drainage, and reclamation districts, such purchases to be made in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board.

GOVERNMENT DEPOSITS

SEC. 15. The moneys held in the general fund of the Treasury, except the 5 per cent fund for the redemption of outstanding national-bank notes and the funds provided in this act for the redemption of Federal reserve notes may, upon the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be deposited in Federal reserve banks, which banks, when required by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall act as fiscal agents of the United States; and the revenues of the Government or any part thereof may be deposited in such banks, and disbursements may be made by checks drawn against such deposits.

No public funds of the Philippine Islands, or of the postal savings, or any Government funds, shall be deposited in the continental United States in any bank not belonging to the system established by this act: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed to deny the right of the Secretary of the Treasury to use member banks as depositories.

NOTE ISSUES

SEC. 16. Federal reserve notes, to be issued at the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board for the purpose of making advances to Federal reserve banks through the Federal reserve agents as hereinafter set forth and for no other purpose, are hereby authorized. The said notes shall be obligations of the United States and shall be receivable by all national and member banks and Federal reserve banks and for all taxes, customs, and other public dues. They shall be redeemed in gold on demand at the Treasury Department of the United States, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, or in gold or lawful money at any Federal reserve bank.

Mr. Speaker, I want to call attention to the provision Congress saw fit to put in this act of 1913, hoping thereby to benefit the farmers of the United States, to wit:

LOANS ON FARM LANDS

SEC. 24. Any national banking association not situated in a central reserve city may make loans secured by improved and unencumbered farm land, situated within its Federal reserve district, but no such loan shall be made for a longer time than five years, nor for an amount exceeding 50 per cent of the actual value of the property offered as security. Any such bank may make such loans in an aggregate sum equal to 25 per cent of its capital and surplus or to one-third of its time deposits and such banks may continue hereafter as heretofore to receive time deposits and to pay interest on the same.

The Federal Reserve Board shall have power from time to time to add to the list of cities in which national banks shall not be permitted to make loans secured upon real estate in the manner described in this section.

Mr. Speaker, I have quoted the foregoing excerpts from the Federal reserve act of 1913 merely to show in numerous ways, too numerous to mention all, and at the expense of the people, Congress has subsidized the Federal reserve system. It is a quasi Government agency—quasi at least—and yet when our friend, our colleague from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS], who has been watchful of its work and its endeavors, wanted to get from it some pertinent information, he could not do it. He believed in the system when it was first formed, like all of us. It did a splendid work for a long time, but when the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS] writes them as a Member of Congress, representing his people, and asks them for definite, pertinent information about their business, they write him back, in effect, "Go to h——; it is none of your business."

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have only a few minutes; but, certainly, I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. Does the gentleman know that the Federal reserve banks have paid into the Federal Treasury, in round figures, approximately $150,000,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and I am going to put the exact figures in the RECORD. I do not care how much they have paid. I know they were subsidized and they are still subsidized by this Nation, and I know that after their "necessary" expenses are paid, and a 6 per cent dividend paid, the law provides that the residue shall be turned into the Treasury of the United States as a franchise tax for the benefit of the people, and the people are concerned with the expenses of the Federal reserve system. The expense of the Federal reserve system, and especially in connection with its many high-salaried and overpaid officials and employees, is a stench in the nostrils of decent Americans, and I want to say to the gentleman that a Member of Congress has the inherent right to know exactly the amount of salaries that the system is paying its army of employees and officials. These Federal reserve banks have squeezed, robbed, wrecked, and ruined many banks, merchants, and citizens all over the United States, and I condemn them for it.

We provided in the act that the five members of the board whom the President was to appoint should receive a salary of only $12,000 per year. This was the maximum limit that the Congress saw fit that the members of the Federal Reserve Board should receive. But just think of what they are paying to their officers and employees. I want to show just how much their expenses are in palatial bank buildings and unreasonably high salaries.

The following, Mr. Speaker, is from the annual report of the Federal Reserve Board for the year 1930:

Federal reserve bank premises—Cost of bank premises of Federal reserve banks and branches to December 31, 1930

NEW BUILDINGS CONSTRUCTED BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

NOTE.—No bank buildings or sites therefor have been acquired for the following branches and agencies: Branches—Charlotte, Portland, Seattle, Spokane; agencies—Savannah, Habana. The Cincinnati branch since Jan. 3, 1928, has occupied quarters in the Chamber of Commerce building, erected on the site leased to the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce by the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland.

The above will show what they have been paying for their palatial buildings over the United States. The following shows their earnings and expenses:

[1] Amount paid as franchise tax for 1922 includes additional franchise tax payments for prior years withdrawn from surplus account on Dec. 31, 1922, as follows: For 1920, $270,389; for 1921, $3,129,673.

Mr. Speaker, it will be noted from the above, quoted from the Federal Reserve Board's report for 1930, that its expenses and expenditures for 1930 were $28,435,862, and that while its gross earnings were $36,424,044 for 1930 it had left after its "pay outs" net earnings of only $7,988,182. Let it also be noted that in the early years of its history it paid to the Government as franchise tax $60,724,742 in 1920 and $59,974,466 in 1921, while in 1930, because of its waste, extravagance, and disgracefully large salaries, it paid to the Government only $17,308.

It may think that it can get away with this kind of business and not answer pertinent questions of Members of Congress, if it wants to, but it has another guess coming to it.

There is an old maxim that the whole is greater than any of its parts. Another one is that no part is as great as the whole. Another one is that the creature is never as great as the creator. I want this Federal Reserve Board and the officers of these Federal reserve banks to remember the above maxims. They have begun to believe that they are bigger than Congress, which created them. They believe that they are bigger than the Government. They must remember that this same Congress that created them can repeal this act and destroy their existence. And they had better answer pertinent questions that any of us may ask them. The huge, unearned salaries they are paying their officials and employees are a stench in the nostrils of all Americans at this time, when millions of men are without jobs and women and little children are starving all over the United States. Just think that they are paying some of their officials annual salaries of $25,000, $30,000, $35,000, $40,000, and $50,000 a year, when people are starving, and the time has come when we ought to stop this abuse and require them to respond to us with proper information. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, let us talk frankly. Some economists believe inflation is necessary. Perhaps it is. This bill is an effort to inflate currency. There is no use camouflaging it. It is bringing about inflation in an unscientific manner for the benefit of only a small part of the people concerned. Inflation, under certain conditions, is sometimes beneficial, but in this instance the entire burden of the inflation, which, if successful, will carry out the purpose that the real sponsors of this bill have in mind, will cost billions of dollars and will be paid by the wage earners and the working people of this country. Now I will tell you why.

Deflation of commodities took place several years ago. Commodity prices of farm products are too low. The difficulty with the farmer to-day is that he is not getting right prices for his commodities. His prices were deflated by the bankers a few years ago. Surely the farmer has not forgotten it. If this inflation is successful, it will naturally bring up commodity prices, but permit me to remind the House during the last 12 months there has been a systematic movement—a drive—to deflate wages of all wage earners, the white-collar class, skilled and unskilled labor, and the wage earner has had his salary reduced from 10 to 20 per cent. Only a few days ago the railroad workers took a 10 per cent cut. Every white-collar employee has had a reduction of his wages; and now that wages have been reduced along comes this inflation with increased commodity prices. It is manifestly unjust and unfair, unless, of course, we have a readjustment of wages. All that we have been hearing for the last 12 months is the cry to reduce wages. That same demand has been made on the floor of this House several times during the present session. In all fairness, it must be admitted that wages were not too high. In fact, they were only balanced with the decreased cost of commodities. As I have stated time and time again, we want to help the farmer, and I have always voted on every bill that was sponsored by the representatives of the farmers here in this House and believed to be helpful. I admit that there should be an increase in commodity prices of farm products. Everyone knows that any sort of inflation will do that. If this is inflation—and it is—I do not see why there is so much pretense in trying to make the public believe it is something else.

My other objection is that every effort that is being made to get out of this crisis is being directed toward helping the bankers who got the country into this condition. When I say "banker" I do not mean small local banks. I mean the very large financial institutions in my city and in Chicago. In the meantime, while we are appropriating and ready to dump $2,000,000,000 through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and here unlimited and incredible credit in the form of accepting almost everything and anything, nothing has been done for immediate direct relief or for the study of a sound constructive economic plan, which would mean something and be of benefit to all the people of the country. Incidentally, only a few days ago we were told that the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation would be the solution of all our troubles and that from it all wrongs would be righted, all troubles corrected, and we would be back to good times. And now it is said that a very high official has confessed that $2,000,000,000 is only a drop in the bucket with our present financial and banking situation. And now we have this money bill with "the sky is the limit."

I want to announce that labor and all wages reduced within the last year must be readjusted. All agreements for wage reductions will necessarily be terminated when this bill becomes a law if it is followed by increased commodity prices. There will be a demand for increased wages to make up the difference in commodity prices that will be brought about by this bill.

What good is your increase of commodity prices if the consumer does not have the money to buy the commodity? What good is inflation unless you have circulation with the inflation? The purchasing power of the public must be increased rather than the credit of the banker.

Let me say to the gentleman from Missouri that, of course, Congress is entitled to have all information on any subject before it. This is the time when the President of the United States and everyone in a place of responsibility is seeking to inspire confidence.

I submit to my colleagues that if they will turn to page 2 of the hearings, they will find there—

General Dawes thereupon addressed the committee, his remarks not being stenographically reported at his own request.

I want to say that such a kind of procedure does not inspire confidence in the American people. [Applause.] If a bank is insolvent, you are not going to make it solvent by not disclosing that fact. Confidence is destroyed by such procedure.

I will tell you what happened. Under a ruling of the Comptroller of the Currency certain securities now held by banks are carried, not on the present market value, but on the prices paid for those securities. This practice has been in effect for several months. Securities which have defaulted in interest or of which there have been previous defaults do not come in under this ruling. On these securities banks have been permitted to charge off gradually a certain depreciation. There is quite a difference in an artificial value arbitrarily permitted for bookkeeping purposes and actual market value. It is only fair to state that the ruling was made in the belief that the present market value was lower than the actual value of the securities. On the other hand, everyone knows that many of the securities were greatly inflated and that for a long time they were rated at exaggerated, unjustified, and unwarranted prices way beyond any book or any other kind of value.

Banks are holding securities on an artificial if not a fictitious value, and there are many instances where banks were closed for this very reason before the rule was promulgated.

Now, if currency is inflated—and I use that term rather than the nomenclature and the diplomatic language of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, a bill to prevent deflation—it is a bill to inflate the currency. If commodity prices go up, everything must go up with them. Prices of securities will increase, and gentlemen must bear in mind that this drive to reduce wages must stop immediately, and we must restore wages, in order to make the measure equitable.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman says that under the comptroller's orders banks are holding securities, not at the market value but the price paid for them, and that is the reason why many banks are open that otherwise would be closed. But the comptroller only permitted this to be done lately, after several hundred banks had closed their doors. If he had adopted this attitude two years ago, hundreds of banks would have been saved. If he permitted many insolvent banks to apply this rule to their securities to-day, they could open their doors to-morrow. It amounts to a discrimination between banks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. True, if such a policy is sound. It is not sound. It does not create liquidity. It is artificial. The policy worked for a few months, and now the terrible calamity, unless something is done immediately. That something now is this inflation bill. It may or may not be sufficient to take care of the situation. It takes more than a bookkeeper to make a bank solvent. Besides, thousands of depositors have lost their deposits, or a large part of them.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does not the gentleman think that the expansion of the currency should sufficiently increase the commodity price level to the stage on which existing indebtedness was contracted to enable debtors who contracted obligations prior to July 1, 1929, to pay their debts, which in turn would also help to provide employment and keep up wages?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Coupled with the bringing up of the wage scale, I agree the farmer ought to be enabled to pay off his debt with a similar kind of a dollar that he contracted those debts, but I add that the consumer, too, must be considered and reinstated in the same position he was in prior to 1929.

Mr. BURTNESS. Ought not all of these things come together, shoulder to shoulder?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Absolutely; but some of the sponsors of this measure in my own city were instrumental first in this tremendous drive to bring down wages, and they have succeeded in part. Many manufacturers and borrowers could not get their seasonal loans from banks until they agreed to reduce wages. Now that they have succeeded in that, this inflation comes along, ignoring the general reduction of wages. I repeat—and I will continue to repeat—increase the purchasing power of the people, rather than always increasing the credit of the bankers at the expense of all the people.

Mr. BURTNESS. That is another question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is the whole question.

Mr. BURTNESS. The gentleman should not forget that the debtor to-day must pay in dollars that are 50 per cent higher in actual value than those which he borrowed, if he borrowed prior to 1929.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. There is no question about that, and all must have the same kind of a dollar.

Mr. BURTNESS. Something of this kind has to be done in order to take care of the debtors of the country.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. With that I am in accord. This bill is not well thought out.

I will state the same objection that I made at the time that the Finance Reconstruction Corporation was under consideration that the first thing to do to restore confidence in the banks must be in the shape of something concrete to give the depositors that confidence. It is indeed a sad commentary on the banking system of our country when it is admitted that $2,000,000,000 have been withdrawn from the banks and are being hoarded. This is a reflection and to the everlasting shame of the bankers and the system which they have created, and no criticism of the thousands and thousands of persons who have lost millions in bad banks and unsafe securities. I fail to see, that even in this bill with its unlimited latitude and tremendous powers, anything that will guarantee to us that the small business man, the manufacturer, or the merchant will get credit any easier than during the last two years. All that we hear is "help the banks, help the railroads"—loans of all sorts to both—and leaving to their tender mercies relief of any kind to the merchants, business men, and manufacturers. After all, the return of normal conditions depends on increased business with increased employment.

The signing of this bill by the President ought to be accompanied by an appeal by him—and he seems to be quite apt at making appeals—that all wages, including the railroad workers, reduced during the last two years should be immediately restored to the 1929 level.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to a discussion of a subject, of various subjects, by two of the most informing gentlemen in the House. They have frequently, very frequently, aided us toward reaching wise conclusions on the proposals of some 25 or 30 of our active committees. I speak with sincerity when I say that they have often aided to better legislation. When these gentlemen entered the field of the Committee on Banking and Currency I was of the hope that they might furnish equally useful information upon the subjects with which that committee deals. I regret that after listening to all that they had to say I fail to get the help that I would personally have welcomed for my own better understanding of this intricate and difficult subject. Instead, they addressed themselves to other matters and aided not at all in respect of the particular proposals now pending, and if the future criticisms of the bill should be as wide of the mark, I think the House, with the exception of the two gentlemen referred to, would be justified in voting solidly for the bill. What wages have to do with the matter is hard to see, and why the remissness of the Federal Reserve Board through the years of its existence should affect a decision on the particular question is equally hard to see.

We are here to save the country from impending danger. I shall not particularize but will point out to you that such action as we are now taking by methods justified only under the most imperative circumstances may of itself testify to the extreme need of action—not of finding fault, not of reviewing ancient history, not of discussing wages, but of saving the financial structure of the United States; and before any man casts his vote against a proposal to that end, recommended by 20 out of 21 members of your Committee on Banking and Currency, recommended by your trusted leaders of both parties, recommended by those who are in charge for the moment of the financial destinies of the land—before he for some unrelated reason casts his vote, let him ask of himself what will the people of the United States think of his attitude in this grave hour of peril.

In two market days the very proposal of this measure added five thousand millions of dollars to the value of what we commonly speak of as securities—five thousand millions of dollars brought by a ray of hope, brought by the certainty in the mind of the business world that this proposal would open the doors of the banks; that this would send the money out into circulation; that this would turn the wheels of industry; that this would set the tractors going over the plains; that this would renew the activities of the land.

I know well that some shortsighted critics will say that we are doing this for the benefit of the speculators, will say that we are only helping those who gamble in the market. Nothing could be farther from the fact. We are doing this to help the banks in order that the banks can help us, in order that the banks now keeping untold millions hoarded through fear of withdrawals of deposits may gain courage, in order that they may with safety proceed again to make loans and thus spread the feeling of confidence that alone can bring us out of this crisis.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I am sorry, but I have only 10 minutes and must decline.

Mr. HOWARD. I am sorry.

Mr. LUCE. Our regret is mutual.

We are but starting money toward effective result when we make it possible to do the three things contemplated by this bill. So far we have not heard a word of criticism aimed at the thing that is before us, aimed at the three proposals we submit, and for which we ask your approval. These propositions have been adequately explained by the chairman of the committee. I do not wish to get involved in a detailed discussion of how they will work. I am pointing out to you that the great cause of financial distress at this moment is the inability of men who have securities to raise moneys with which to transact the ordinary business of industry and commerce. These proposals contemplate that through a possible year of emergency—and we all pray the need may not continue even that long—there may be more of what some men are pleased to call inflation. The word is used with scorn, as if there was something dangerous and harmful in the thing itself, but what we need now is inflation, properly controlled, as it is controlled in this bill, shackled by the provisions that you may read for yourselves, controlled by those to whom for the moment we must intrust our welfare. In all times of great national distress, men have turned to individuals and have intrusted them with temporary power, power that under other circumstances might seem extreme, might seem full of danger, but which in times of crises is necessary for national preservation. Because such a time is upon us; because the need exists, an imperative, commanding need, I pray that no man may hesitate to intrust this power to men whom we know in our hearts will be patriotic men, will be unselfish men, will have only the welfare of the country at heart, and will use their power for the common welfare. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I am very much in favor of this bill. The bill does not do everything that I would like it to do. It does not do everything that several of my colleagues on the Committee on Banking and Currency would like it to do, but it is a tremendous advance over anything we have ever had before in the House of Representatives in the 11 years I have had the honor to serve here.

Under this bill the machinery is furnished to the Federal reserve system to put money into the market to take the place of the credit currency which is tied up in frozen loans. There is in the bill no specific direction to the Federal reserve system to use that machinery for that purpose, but there is an implied direction, and a direction which I do not think they can possibly disregard. It will have released about $1,000,000,000 that it is not now possible for them to use. When they use that for a 40 per cent reserve, that gives them about $2,500,000,000, which in the member banks can be expanded on an average of ten times, which is over $25,000,000,000, which is entirely adequate for the purpose of liquidating the debts of the country, starting up the machinery of business, and putting people to work.

The other evening a man who is very high in the political affairs of a great European nation said to me that he was very much afraid that unless there was further forgiveness of European debts, foreign countries, particularly France, would find it necessary to withdraw the gold they had on deposit in this country. I probably lost my temper. I said to him, "You are a guest in this country and you are entitled, of course, to consideration and respect and courtesy, but I want to say to you that within a week the Congress of the United States will pass a bill which will release all the free gold necessary for our purposes, and France can take her gold and go to h—— with it." [Applause.]

Now, the thought is apparently in the mind of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] that the workingman is going to be injured by a rise in prices. There is not a man in this country who would vote for legislation that would injure the laboring man, but a rise in the price level is the only thing that will keep the machinery of business going. It is the only thing that will keep the laboring man with the job he has got.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. ALLGOOD. And it will seek to give employment to the 7,000,000 men that are out of jobs in this country, will it not?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Absolutely. If I did not think that was its distinct tendency, I would not favor it. If in its administration by the Federal Reserve Board the purposes of this bill are carried out, it will be of great benefit to all the people. If the people of the United States knew that the policy of the Federal reserve system would be to use this legislation for the purpose of raising the price level, liquidating the debts of the country, and starting the machinery of factories, what would happen? Immediately those who have money, knowing that prices were going to be raised, would go into the market and buy. The retailer would buy from the wholesaler; the wholesaler would buy from the manufacturer; the manufacturer would start his factories, and the laboring man would go to work in them. That is what would happen.

As I said before, this bill is not exactly what I would like, but it is a tremendous advance. In a bill which I introduced on the 19th of January—H. R. 8026—and which I sent to the Secretary of the Treasury and to each member of the Federal Reserve Board with a covering letter, there is a specific direction, coupled with the principles involved in this bill but more broadly stated, that the Federal reserve system shall use all of its powers—the powers that it now has and the additional powers that this legislation will give it—to raise the price level to the level of 1926, and then maintain it at that point. The reason 1926 was picked out was that from the 1st day of July, 1913, to the 1st day of July, 1928, a period of 15 years, the average price level was within one-tenth of 1 per cent of what the price level was in 1926. That year was selected by me as being the one which was fair to the debtor, fair to the creditor, fair to the producer, and fair to the man who has something to sell.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. ARENTZ. And I may say fair to the laborer as well, because when everybody has plenty of money and they sell their goods at high prices, the laborer is employed at a wage suitable to the occasion.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. The laboring man, the man who lives from day to day, is always the first consideration.

Now, the Federal reserve system is thoroughly aware of the purposes of this bill. It is thoroughly aware that the purpose of it is to give the Federal reserve system an opportunity to go into the market and start raising the price level and reestablish the confidence of the people. They are honorable men. They are men of ability. They are men of experience. They have not always in the past used their powers in the way I would like them to, but they have a magnificent opportunity for the demonstration of a high-class and unselfish Americanism, and I believe they will make fine use of this opportunity.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I agree with what the gentleman has to say and the objectives to be obtained by this bill. Why, in section 3, are the provisions limited to one year? Does the gentleman think it would be unwise to give those powers to the Federal reserve system permanently?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I can best answer that by saying that in the bill I introduced they were given that power permanently. Of course, I could not get all I wanted in this bill; but if they have it for one year and it works out, Congress will come pretty near seeing that it is made permanent legislation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. If it is continued for a year and demonstrates its usefulness, the gentleman thinks it will be easy enough to enact legislation making it permanent?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is my judgment.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I wonder if the gentleman could take a Federal note of $10 denomination and show just exactly what this bill does with that $10 piece of currency.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I do not think I can get any more time, so I can not answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I can not say very much in one minute. I had expected to have at least two. I think on the whole this is probably the most promising piece of legislation that has been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee at this session of Congress. The bill, however, fails, I think, to take cognizance of what I believe to be a permanent change in the character of paper held by national and other member banks of the Federal reserve system. The liberalization of the discount facilities of the Federal reserve banks, provided in this bill, is something which has been needed for a considerable length of time, and I believe it should be made permanent legislation. I am glad the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] thinks that if it has demonstrated its usefulness that at the expiration of one year it can be made permanent. [Applause.]

The original idea behind national bank legislation was to keep the assets of these banks as liquid as possible. The same principle applies to all banks of deposit. The principle would appear sound, but national and other banks have found it increasingly difficult to make a profit without investing in long-term paper of one kind or another. More and more they have become loaded down with United States, State, and municipal bonds and other securities that are not subject to discount with the Federal reserve. The depreciation of these securities has made them unsalable, except at great loss. In order to protect depositors and guard against runs, large cash reserves are the rule. The result is that the banks make no money and customers are not taken care of for loans.

This development has placed our whole credit structure in the position of Prometheus, tied hand and foot, and unable to give aid. The elasticity which the Federal reserve systew was intended to give to our currency is gone. Deflation and distress have been the result.

Either member banks should not be allowed to carry such securities or they should be eligible for rediscount with the Federal reserve. How else can member banks be kept liquid?

It is estimated that not less than $1,400,000,000 have been withdrawn from circulation by depositors by what is commonly called "hoarding." A much greater sum is "hoarded" by the banks by maintaining excessive reserves for fear of runs. This means a curtailment of credit anywhere from eight to ten billion dollars. You can readily appreciate what this does to the country.

If confidence is to be restored, there must be an expansion of both currency and credit. If the Federal-reserve rediscount facilities can not be made available for perfectly sound bonds and other public securities, the advocates of remonetization of silver will have ample reason for pressing their claims. Not only that but there will be sound basis for broadening the base of our currency.

The present bill has more promise in the way of the revival of business and increase of commodity prices than anything so far considered. For months I have insisted that there must be a liberalization of the Federal reserve act. The only trouble with the present bill is that it is so restrictive and cautious that it may fail of its purpose. I greatly regret that it is being considered under suspension, thereby making it impossible for Members to offer amendments. I feel sure that if it were open to amendment, it would be liberalized by this body.

I have no fear of an excessive inflation under it. The best thing that could happen would be an inflation of prices sufficient to give farm commodities a debt-paying power equal to what they had when our farmers borrowed what they now owe.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY]. [Applause.]

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Speaker, we have now come to consider a bill which is presented to save the country from the situation into which the large banking interests of this country have engulfed us. [Applause.]

A year or two ago we had extensive hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. The chief of the banking business of this country, Mr. Pole, Comptroller of the Currency, began those hearings by appearing before the committee. He told us that only one type of banking in this country was the proper type, and that was chain banking. During those hearings he said that:

> Modern banking is highly complicated and a technical business, and it is exemplified primarily by the city banks, which have been compelled to meet the varied financial demands of commerce and industry.

Continuing his statement, he said:

> The old-fashioned character of loans has almost disappeared.

And I might add that the people who used to get that character of loans have disappeared financially since that time. He said also:

> We have reached a stable development where the instruments of credit are ample. Great emphasis is now laid upon adequate credit information and analysis. Nothing is left to chance or guesswork.

And he continued to discuss the security business into which the banks had launched themselves; he described that as the principal activity in the banking world whereby the profits of the banking business were obtained. A number of us believed that was a mistaken idea for the chief at the helm of the management of the banking interests of this country to hold. Other eminent gentlemen appeared before the committee. One among them was Mr. Robert O. Lord, president-guardian of the Detroit Union group at Detroit. Agreeing with other gentlemen of his caliber as big bankers, he said:

> I do not believe that a bank can survive in a small town over a period of years.

I asked him:

> Do you believe that a bank will survive reasonably well in a town smaller than 10,000 people?

He said:

> It will, in my opinion, have to have exceptionally able management.

I then asked:

> What would you suggest in the way of affording banking facilities for a place having a population smaller than 10,000 people?

To which Mr. Lord replied:

> Branch banking.

So that takes my district entirely out of the field where we might have a bank, and it takes out the districts of many of you who do not have cities of that size.

The fallacy which possessed the minds of the big bankers of this country caused the tragedy we are facing financially. Yet they sponsored security issues and passed them down through the country and smaller banks until they siphoned the savings of the people from the outlying sections into the big banks, and now the sources of wealth are dried up.

This particular bill is designed to afford more eligible paper for discounting. The Federal reserve system holds today $900,000,000 of paper to back the notes it has issued. Two billion nine hundred million dollars' worth of Federal reserve notes is backed by $900,000,000 worth of paper and $2,000,000,000 in gold.

By this bill we are providing more eligible paper, not that there is not eligible paper in the country now. There is three and a half billion dollars' worth of commercial eligible paper, but the banks will not use it. It is what you call "frozen credit" and what some of the witnesses that came before us called frozen credit. The president of the Federal Reserve Board said "We have no control over the banks that hold that three and a half billion dollars of eligible paper, and, therefore, we can not use it and we can not compel them to borrow on it and lend the money to industry."

He said that the objection the banks have to using this paper to get credits through the Federal reserve system or to get currency through the Federal reserve system is because they do not want to show a debit on their books and cause their depositors to feel that the bank owed money, and probably cause a run on that bank. The administration complains about the people drawing a few hundred dollars out of the banks and hoarding it at home, but nobody has complained about the banking institutions of this country holding three and a half billion dollars of eligible paper and freezing that credit so it can not be used by business and commerce.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. SIROVICH. In addition to the paper that is now eligible for rediscount with the Federal reserve, what additional paper would be subject to rediscount?

Mr. BUSBY. I could not classify that, because it is not named in the bill. It is similar in kind to the paper that is already eligible for rediscount, such as the Federal reserve bank thinks safe and proper to be used for credit.

Mr. SIROVICH. What paper would that be?

Mr. BUSBY. That will be largely decided as an administrative matter.

I am going to support this bill, because I think it is a palliative. It was stated the other day in the press that I said it was a mere palliative. I say yet that it is a mere palliative, because it does not strike at the fundamental thing that has caused all the trouble.

The country has drifted without restraining the manipulations by the big banking interests in their security-flotation and security-selling business with the people, constantly exchanging those things with them for the wealth they have accumulated through labor, and in this way brought about the present condition.

This bill will help some to inflate currency circulation, but what we need to do is to enact legislation that will make commodities—things produced on the farm and by labor everywhere—have some standing in the system of valuating the exchange we use. That is what we need. Look at the yardstick of measuring values. In 1926 imagine a merchant using a yardstick by which he sold 3 feet of cloth for a yard. Suppose you went to that same merchant now and said that the yardstick should be lengthened, if you are a wheat grower, so the merchant must sell 12 feet of cloth to the yard. Or if you are a cotton grower, 15 feet of cloth for a yard. You would not expect that merchant to remain in business long. That is exactly the picture of the producers of commodities all over this country. It is being demanded of them that they respond to a longer yardstick. The dollar reaches very much further than it used to, but the trouble is that there are very few to-day who can meet the demands of the lengthened yardstick.

So I am primarily interested in getting legislation that will properly regulate the measure of values so as to make the measure reasonably stable in relation to commodities, a proper measure for our dollars.

When Secretary of the Treasury Mills was before our committee, I said in the hearings, pages 29 and 30:

Mr. BUSBY. In regard to this legislation, you regard this bill as being a piece of emergency legislation, do you not?

Secretary MILLS. No; I think that is a great piece of constructive banking legislation; it so happens that it meets the needs of very unusual conditions.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, do you regard the present financial condition through which we are passing a necessary stage through which our finances should gravitate from time to time?

Secretary MILLS. Well, that is a tough one; of course, human nature being what it is, who can say when the day will come when we will not be guilty of such excess of expansion that retribution will not necessarily follow; we are suffering, as we suffered before, from a wild period of inflation and expansion, and on top of that the necessary liquidation and deflation. We have now had what I call artificial contraction and deflation due to the psychological element, and the time has come now to arrest this process—that is the way I feel about it.

Mr. BUSBY. Do you regard our system as being such that it is necessary in the experience of this country, in a financial way, to go through periods, I mean cycles of expansions followed by periods of deflations such as this, and that has been our experience—do you regard that as being necessary and a permanent thing that we must look for and that we must expect?

Secretary MILLS. Mr. BUSBY, if I said I did not think it was necessary you would then ask me what my remedy was, and you would have me.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, that is where I am going; I would like to go along with you, because you are now our most responsible representative from the standpoint of the National Treasury.

Secretary MILLS. I feel very strongly that the time has come to arrest this deflationary process.

Mr. BUSBY. I am not talking about that right now—I am talking about the system under which we proceed, and the people set up their plans, and they work for a period of 8 or 10 years, and then we turn the corner and find the people, the producers and the laborers, wiped out and most of them absolutely flattened out financially; and then, under our system, it being necessary for them to start all over again, what I am driving at are the fundamentals involved in our very system of national finance. I would like to hear you discuss that.

Secretary MILLS. Well, if I had a remedy for curing these up-and-down swings, I suppose that I would probably be the greatest man in the world, but I just do not have it.

Mr. BUSBY. Well, now, in your very responsible position with this Government, would you acquiesce in conclusions of others who think they have a remedy, having hearings and proceeding to question our present situation, and offer to substitute something else for consideration that would be more fundamentally correct than our present arrangement?

Secretary MILLS. Mr. BUSBY, I would be a very stupid person if I did not acquiesce in a willingness to study any thoughtful and well-considered plan that would do away with these wide fluctuations that entail so much unhappiness and misery; of course I would be willing to study it.

Following this statement of Secretary of the Treasury Mills I am going to present to you a workable and approved plan to stabilize the buying power of the masses of the people—a plan that is approved by the leading thinkers and economists everywhere.

GOLD AND MONETARY STABILIZATION

The reason for Congress coming together is to legislate for the people. Their happiness and safety are at times dependent on the speedy and wise action of Congress, and such is our situation to-day. Not simply an unusual condition, but a calamity is upon the country.

The health, contentment, and lives of our people are so greatly affected by our standard of value that it is now imperative that Congress and the President discover the cause of our financial trouble, which is literally starving the lives out of thousands. When the cause of the trouble is discovered (and that is no mystery now to anyone who will take time to look and see), then sensible and reasonable legislation should be enacted in the interest of the people to remedy conditions.

The trouble facing the big majority of the Members of Congress to-day is that the President, the administration, and the leaders do not propose any remedy relating to the source of our financial trouble—not even an honest effort to study or hold hearings on proposals to correct what everyone knows to be the cause of our wrong. We sit and wait and wait while conditions grow worse for the hungry people.

My committee, the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, is the place to begin, and I, for one, am ready to go! Politics nor all the money powers with their nonsensical ridicule and "calf-path" precedents should prevent us from doing what we can to correct an intolerable condition. So vital is this cause that if Congress did nothing else but consider this question till it is settled right, the time would be well spent.

It is, therefore, my purpose to-day to talk to the House on the subject, "Gold and Monetary Stabilization in Relation to the Index Number of Wholesale Commodity Prices."

I want to say that the proposals I am about to discuss are not discoveries of my own. They are not new ideas being presented to Congress for the first time. Like the Federal reserve system, it has been necessary for these proposals to abide their turn until such a time as the financial condition of the world has forced the conviction upon the Congress and the country that our present currency and monetary system has wholly failed to meet the needs of commerce, industry, and trade, and has through the variable purchasing power of the dollar wrecked the fortunes, hopes, and happiness of our people.

The Federal reserve system is but one-half of the monetary problem settled. It is the shell or house in which could be operated to splendid effect an equitably set-up currency. But in this "house" remains the medieval archaic system of measuring property values of hundreds of usable things by one thing of variable supply and value which can be purposely manipulated, maldistributed, and shifted to suit the interests of a few men. That one thing which has been accorded the preeminence of fixing the values of all other things is gold. The time is now at hand when justice and the safety of our Nation demand that our basic financial trouble be corrected at its source.

The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH], working with Dr. Irving Fisher, professor of political economy of Yale University, and with others of the world's leading financial economists, presented a plan in a bill introduced in Congress by the gentleman from Maryland in 1922. Extensive hearings were had on that and subsequent bills on the "stabilization of the purchasing power of money" by the House Committe on Banking and Currency.

THE GOLD STANDARD

My discussion necessarily begins by directing your attention to the meaning of the "gold standard." The gold standard means, in a few words, that a nation's currency is convertible into gold at a fixed amount or weight of gold. The holder of any kind of currency may have it redeemed in gold by the central bank or the Treasury as long as a country remains on the gold basis. By statute in the United States—

> The dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine-tenths fine shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such a parity.

Gold by law, therefore, shall always be worth $20.67 an ounce. No more, no less, regardless of supply and demand. Professor Rogers, in his recent book, says:

> Among the world's most sacred institutions in this period of its history is the gold standard. Selected and handed down to us from a distant past, it has come in time to be regarded as one of the laws of the Medes and Persians. Woe unto him who dares question either its perfection or its permanence.

I do not propose the abandonment of gold as a basis for our currency. What I do suggest for your consideration is a perfectly logical arrangement which makes gold serve industry, commerce, and trade as an elastic base for a currency that will at all times represent the value of commodities, based on utility, supply, and demand. The essentials of the plan, briefly stated, are these.

THE PLAN TO STABILIZE BUYING POWER

The coinage of gold into circulating medium or money should cease, and gold coins should be declared no longer legal tender for the payment of debts. Gold coin and gold bullion owned or acquired by the United States should be converted into bars of standard gold of not less than 5 ounces each. These should be deposited in the Treasury of the United States. Against these bars should be issued by the United States "gold-bullion dollar certificates" which would take the place of the "gold-coin dollar certificates" now in circulation. The gold-bullion dollar certificate should certify, "that the United States of America will pay to the bearer on demand $100 in standard gold bars of not less than 5 ounces each, and any smaller balance in any lawful money." This change would in no way disturb our present arrangement about national-bank notes, Federal reserve notes, silver, or any other part of our money plan.

We should provide that the gold dollar of the United States shall cease to be a constant quantity—25.8 grains—of gold of variable purchasing power, and that it shall be a variable quantity of standard gold bullion of approximately constant computed purchasing power. To compute the approximate constant purchasing power of the gold-bullion dollar it should be fixed in relation to commodity prices covering a reasonably long period of time to get a fair average, or in relation to the prices for the year 1926 which has been selected by the Bureau of Labor Statistics as representing such an average. From a list of the commodities and the quantities therof marketed at wholesale in the United States the Bureau of Labor Statistics should compute index numbers so as to approximately measure the average fluctuations in the purchasing power of gold of these commodities for the year 1926, when the price of commodities as a whole was on a reasonably fair relation to gold and its purchasing power. From these several average prices computed for 1926 the Bureau of Labor Statistics shall compute the "goods dollar." This goods dollar, composed as already stated of combined or composite commodity values in just proportions, shall be for reference purposes in fixing, from time to time, the quantity of gold in the gold-bullion dollar.

To make myself more explicit, if I can, for many years one of the services performed by the Federal Government for its people has been maintained in the Department of Labor and is designated as the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. This bureau is conducted under the Department of Labor by a personnel that scientifically determines and compiles from day to day information concerning wholesale prices of every important item and of the various classes of the several items which go into the trade and commerce of our country.

COMMODITY INDEX PRICE

This bureau began its operations many years ago, dealing with comparatively few articles. It has gradually broadened the scope of its surveys into prices and has included additional articles and classes of articles which enter into our trade and commerce, until at present statistics are computed on 784 items. Each week the Bureau of Labor Statistics publishes the wholesale purchasing power of each of the 784 commodities in relation to the purchasing power of the dollar of 1926. This is what is known as the index price for each of these commodities. After the wholesale price for each commodity in trade is obtained for each of the weeks throughout the year, then these weekly prices are combined, the average struck, and the annual average price or index for that commodity is obtained. When all of the separate index prices of the several commodities are obtained for the year, then these 784 commodity index prices are combined and the average for all of them obtained, showing the relative purchasing power of commodities in trade and industry as their values relate to commodity values in 1926. This last finding we call the wholesale commodity price index.

For several years prior to the World War commodity prices in relation to the purchasing power of the dollar ran on almost a level to the year 1913. This was greatly disturbed during the period of the war. By 1921, however, commodity prices in relation to the purchasing power of the dollar seemed to have settled back to a new basis. From 1922 through 1928 commodity prices and the dollar apparently had reached a stable relationship, which was about 25 per cent more favorable to commodities or trade than it was in 1913.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, having before it all of the facts in regard to 1913 conditions of living, transportation, communication, advancement, and progress, believed that the prices of 1926 represented a better and fairer relation for determining a proper base on which to figure commodity prices in relation to the purchasing power of the dollar, fixed prices for the year 1926 to represent 100 per cent of what commodity prices ought to be in relation to the dollar. Therefore the wholesale commodity index price for 1926 became, as it were, the polestar of prices, the center of gravity to which a proper relation between money and commodities ought to be maintained, the measuring stick which should be provided for business finance and contractual obligations as they related to the dollar. It is absolutely necessary, therefore, to have this fixed measure for a specific time of the purchasing power of the dollar, so that it will be possible to gravitate and stabilize toward that point. If a time should come when the prices for the year 1926 should no longer prevail, then another more equitable period should be adopted.

Another word of explanation in regard to the commodity price index. Considering from week to week and month to month the wholesale commodity price index varies up or down but little, yet there may be noted great variations in individual commodities under peculiar conditions. Supply and demand have a tendency to affect, for instance, the price of wheat, cotton, steel, copper, as well as other commodities. They may be greatly out of line with the index prices of all commodities taken together. I shall refer to this more at length later.

A further provision in a law to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar should provide that the Bureau of Labor Statistics, from the average wholesale price quotations, shall on the first of each month in the manner I have already outlined, compute the value of the commodity index price in relation to the "goods dollar" or the fair measure of values already ascertained as to 1926 to be used as a guide. The bureau shall ascertain if commodities are selling too low or too high and the extent of the variation.

BUREAU OF THE MINT DECLARE AMOUNT OF GOLD IN DOLLAR

The Bureau of Labor Statistics shall immediately transfer its findings to the Bureau of the Mint, and it shall forthwith calculate a percentage of correction or adjustment to be added to or subtracted from the then weight of the gold-bullion dollar. The Bureau of the Mint shall forthwith give public notice that until changed by further like notice, in accordance with the law, the number of grains of standard gold so computed shall constitute the gold dollar of the United States. Gold-bullion dollar certificates shall then be redeemable in gold-bullion dollars at said rate, and gold will be purchased at the same price by the Government.

The daily statement of the United States Treasury for January 25 gave the gold certificates outstanding at $1,676,000,000. These certificates are issued on gold coins held in the United States Treasury of the weight of 25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine, per dollar. The amount of gold back of each certificate under the present law never varies in quantity. It is an inelastic base. There is just as much reason for currency certificates to be issued against gold bullion as there is for them to be issued against gold coin.

INELASTIC CURRENCY

One of the great troubles with the American banking system, and one which led up to the adoption of the Federal reserve system, was that our currency was inelastic. In times when we needed more currency we could not make the supply expand. When we needed less currency and were in danger of inflation we could not contract the supply. When national bank notes were once issued and became the circulating medium they remained in circulation largely at the pleasure of the issuing bank. Retirement was not controlled by the Treasury.

If there is good reason to have an elastic currency so as to serve or control the supply of bank credit, it seems just as reasonable that we should have an elastic base for that currency so that we could keep the purchasing power of the dollar somewhat in a constant relation to the center of gravity of commodity prices. By adopting the gold-bullion dollar of computed relatively constantly purchasing power, but of a variable quantity of gold, it would indeed be easy to lower the amount of gold in a dollar so as to make the gold-bullion dollar certificate obtainable with a less quantity of commodities.

VELOCITY OF CURRENCY

The same amount of currency at all times is not required by the business of any country. Dollars in trade move much faster at some times than they do at others. The amount of work done by a dollar of currency depends to a great extent on the rapidity with which that dollar circulates, or the "velocity" with which the currency moves. If we place a number of men at work and some of them are busy while others are idle, or partially so, certainly we do not expect satisfactory results. So if money outstanding remains hidden away or is idle in bank vaults, it accomplishes little or nothing in the way of assisting trade.

Outstanding currency in the United States in the fall of 1929 was about $37 per capita. At the present time (February, 1932) the outstanding currency is more than $44 per capita. It appears from this that less money was in circulation during what appeared to be a very prosperous time than is now in circulation in a time of great financial depression and distresses. But at that period of 1929, the turnover of deposits in the banks of the country was about 5.75 times the amount of those deposits per month. That was the "velocity" of currency and credit at that time, while at the present time the turnover of demand deposits in our banks is less than 2.50 times per month and that is the "velocity" of the activity of money and credits now. So you can very easily see that $1 of currency and bank credits in 1929 was doing more than twice the business that it is to-day. An issue of an additional amount of currency, whether based on outstanding Government bonds or in accordance with some of the other many plans suggested, would undoubtedly inflate our currency and bring some activity in business for a short time, but such a process would only be a further charge against the national credit. It would not bring any added wealth into the equation. The final result would probably prove that we had not bettered our condition. So we must look to some other remedy to correct the inequality existing between the present purchasing power of the dollar and commodity prices.

No economist that I know questions in the least the accuracy of the findings of the wholesale commodity index price by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Such prices form the basis of the computations of all statistical organizations, private and public, that serve commerce and trade. They are quoted as the sole basis in determining in trade the value and the relation of the value of commodities to each other.

Since the commodity index price is accepted as the polestar by trade and commerce, I can see no objection to adopting it as the fixed point to which commodity prices and the purchasing power of the dollar should relate. I give you an illustration to indicate what a gold dollar of relatively computed constant purchasing power and of a variable quantity of standard gold means:

UNSTABLE DOLLAR AND ITS EFFECT

In my State of Mississippi in 1926 cotton was selling for $100 a bale. Contracts were made and obligations entered into on that basis. In other words, 10 bales of cotton were worth $1,000. Since that time conditions have changed. We say that cotton has gone down in value. Cotton is now selling for about $25 a bale.

To still further illustrate the point, suppose my neighbor had sold 10 bales of cotton for $1,000 and loaned the money to me at 6 per cent interest for five years. I would have thought I was getting an advantageous loan. It would have been an easy loan in the light of the facts before me. Time goes on. I paid the interest each year until this year, when my loan matures. I have made splendid crops of cotton. My neighbor calls on me for his $1,000. I intended when I secured the loan to sell cotton with which to pay him. When I attempt to do so I find it will take the proceeds of 40 bales of cotton at present prices to repay my neighbor what he received for 10 bales five years ago.

What I have said about cotton is true of wheat, potatoes, corn, dairy products, steel, copper, and almost any and every commodity used in trade. No nation or people can calculate against such disastrous conditions, which, I contend, and which I propose to show, are brought about not by the lack of value in commodities but by the high price to which the dollar has soared on the unbending, unchanging, gold-standard basis, and that without regard to maldistribution or selfish manipulation of the world's monetary gold supply. If the outstanding gold-bullion certificates bought gold from the Treasury only in proportion to the relation of the value of commodities to the dollar when the commodity prices dropped 10 per cent, then under the plan outlined the amount of gold necessary to redeem outstanding gold-bullion certificates would decrease also 10 per cent. So you can easily see that it would take less wheat to buy a dollar gold certificate with a less number of grains of gold to the dollar than it would if the dollar contains 25.8 grains of gold.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics on January 3 announced the revision of its index numbers of wholesale prices, including 784 commodities or price series, weighted according to the importance of each article and based on the average prices for 1926 as 100 per cent.

The commodity index number was 66.3 for December; or, in other words, as a whole commodities were worth only 66.3 cents per dollar of what they were in 1926. So to reverse the figure, two-thirds of a dollar would buy the quantity of commodities that could be bought with a dollar on 1926 prices. A dollar would buy one and one-half times the commodities it would have bought in 1926. So the producer of commodities, on an average, would have to sell as much and one-half again as much commodities now with which to purchase money or gold as he would have had to do in 1926.

To stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar at 1926 prices would, of necessity, stabilize the amount of gold in the dollar at 25.8 grains, nine-tenths fine. Not only would the plan I have outlined to you stabilize the price of commodities but it would certainly and definitely make the gold in a dollar also a dependable thing.

BROADEN THE CURRENCY BASE

What we need now, during the time when gold is badly distributed among the nations, is a broader base for our currency. By requiring fewer grains of gold to represent the dollar we would thereby make it spread farther for the redemption of outstanding gold certificates and make a smaller amount of gold effectively do more work and stabilize more currency. When inflation is imminent and commodity prices rising, automatically the gold-currency base would be contracted and inflation thereby put to a great disadvantage. The result would be price stabilization in relation to the guiding point selected. No such service is possible under our present fixed-quantity gold-standard-base arrangement

The exact opposite effect is true. When we need a broader base for our currency, the supply of gold available contracts, goes into hiding, and shifts to treasury vaults in a few nations, where it does no more work in broadening the base of currencies or in assisting to relieve by creating liquid conditions for values than so much pig-iron would do.

Through the Federal reserve system, its power over open-market operations, discount and rediscount rates, and "eligibility for discount" rules, much has been done and can be done to regulate the flow and to control the amount of bank credits. This is but one phase of the important question. It has a tendency to affect prices and business in isolated and scattered instances on the outskirts of the field of finance and business. The other fundamental and basic question necessary to be dealt with is to make the currency base truly reflect the value of commodities.

SCIENTIFIC CURRENCY BASE

The time has come when the scientific organization of a currency base must be undertaken and accomplished so that it will work as the counterpart of the scientifically organized credit machinery, exemplified by the Federal reserve system. If gold becomes scarce, if it is hoarded, if it is maldistributed by circumstances or selfish banking interests, so that it is difficult or impossible to obtain, must prices, business, and commerce always be compelled to suffer as they do now?

The United States Constitution provides "that Congress shall have the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." The Congress has never exercised the prerogative of regulating the value of money but has left that to chance or to the banking institutions that have controlled gold, which institutions have often sought to perfect its maldistribution for their own gain.

What is the purpose of a currency or money? It is to have a medium of exchange of value so as to enable the owner of a material object possessing utility, of the laborer, to exchange his product for some other like or different kind of product desired by him.

Then why permit gold or a lack of gold to disturb the commerce and peace of the world? Are we weaklings in this age and generation who have not the hardihood to undertake the solution of our ills? Surely this Congress has upon it the duty, yea, the imperative necessity, of finding the solution!

I have discussed the proposals outlined with the scientific men and the leading economists in the employment of the Government. Not one of them but who says the arrangement would be ideal if it could be put into practice. At present we attempt to bring about somewhat the same kind of result in the financial world by changing interest rates, discount and rediscount rates, and other types of credit control. While the Federal reserve system participates in these regulatory activities, they are left in great part to private bankers who are always working and acting for their own interest. Trying to regulate the purchasing power of currency and the flow of credits through this unorganized, irresponsible method is now shown, and has always proven in unusual times, to be a failure. The regulation of the purchasing power of money and the flow of credit should absolutely be basic and by an agency of the Government which has the welfare and interest of the people at heart. The Federal reserve system should be authorized and directed to use all its powers to restore the level of wholesale commodity prices to that for the year of 1926, and thereafter to use all the powers of the Federal reserve system to maintain such a level. These two agencies working together, the Bureau of Labor Statistics and the Bureau of the Mint, with the Federal reserve system, to establish and maintain the equilibrium of the purchasing power of commodities, would certainly be effective in the undertaking. When prices are once restored to the 1926 level, they could easily be kept at or near that point without any great variation.

THE BANKERS' IDEAL CURRENCY SYSTEM

Ideal currencies from the large bankers' point of view would be, every country in the world on a gold-standard basis and the currencies in each of those countries backed by the amount of gold necessary to meet the legal reserve requirements. That would be, I say, the bankers' ideal currency condition throughout the world. That situation is the only arrangement believed by international bankers to be a sound money condition. Yet it does not exist in the world to-day. It has never been true and no doubt will be less true in the future than it has in the past. Production of gold has not kept pace with the needs of commerce and trade. The best thinkers on the subject of finance and monetary stability admit that within a very few years the supply of gold will be wholly inadequate to stabilize the currencies of the world.

Our present experience teaches us that international bankers and international credit sellers can easily, through methods employed by them, shift the monetary gold from one part of the world to another.

MALDISTRIBUTION OF GOLD

What is the situation to-day? There is about $11,300,000,000 worth of monetary gold in the world.

The United States needs $2,400,000,000 worth of gold to stabilize its currency, but it has $4,500,000,000 worth of gold, or $2,100,000,000 more than it needs.

France needs $1,100,000,000 worth of gold to stabilize its currency, but it has $3,000,000,000 worth of gold in its treasury, an excess of $1,900,000,000.

Together, France and the United States, two countries having only 162,000,000 people, have amassed seven and one-half billion dollars of the world's supply of gold, leaving only $3,800,000,000 of monetary gold for the other nations of the world. This amount does not equal the idle gold held inactive and unworking in the Treasuries of the United States and France. These two countries together need three and one-half billion dollars worth of gold. They have that amount and an additional $4,000,000,000 of the monetary gold, which is not being put to present use for currency purposes.

I have stressed these conditions to impress upon you the fact that gold managed as it is, is not a safe or stable thing as a base for the currencies of the world.

What results from this bad distribution? It is, as it were, as if only $7,300,000,000 worth of monetary gold was in the world to-day, because that is the whole amount of gold that is working to stabilize currencies. The effect is, since in gold-standard countries all currency is kept at a parity and redeemable in gold, money has become so high in price that it is practically impossible to buy any appreciable amount of it with commodities.

It may be contended that there is an overproduction of commodities. Such is not the case, because statistics show that commodity production has varied very little, one year with another, for the past several years. There is always a great underconsumption, however, when people can not get money with which to purchase the necessities of life, and that is the situation to-day. If I throw a few coins into the air and all of them come down heads up, I might think it possible but unusual for each of them to fall alike. If I throw a hundred coins into the air and they all fall heads up, while it is possible for them to do so the result is so out of line with human experience that I would wonder if the coins did not have a head on either side or if they were not loaded to cause them to fall that way. If the prices of only a few commodities had fallen since 1929, we might think it strange but not greatly out of line with what could be expected, but when we observe that the price of practically every commodity has fallen, and fallen greatly since 1929, we feel that we know that some other cause is at fault beside overproduction. We are completely convinced that it is not due to any economic law or to supply and demand, but that this result is due alone to the soaring price of gold, the commodity selected by us to measure all values.

Only four countries in the entire world are on the gold standard to-day—the United States, France, Holland, and Switzerland. A few other small countries in Europe are partially on the gold standard, but their finance ministers are authorized to issue exchange restrictions. The number of countries on the gold basis are not 10 per cent of the number of important commercial countries engaged in world trade and commerce. The currency of more than 40 nations has not been on the gold standard or has been forced off within recent months by the maldistribution of gold. No country in Asia is on the gold standard. Every country in South America is off the gold standard. When a country goes off the gold standard, its currency greatly depreciates in the money markets of the world. That country then is at a great disadvantage in meeting its obligations which must be paid in the currencies of gold-standard countries.

The foreign-exchange rates which prevail in the international money markets of the world are fixed by the international banking interests. These exchange rates are based on considerations of peculiar import to the world bankers. The question of international exchange rates is a study within itself. I have not time to go into that fully here. However, the international exchange rates, adopted and manipulated by the banking interest, are one of the methods used by it to shift gold from one country to another to the advantage of the bankers and often to the great disadvantage of the holders of the bonds and securities of different countries. I say again that the gold standard is the kind of currency basis that is favored by the banking systems of the world. A close check is kept on the movements of gold. Every day information may be had as to the exact amount of gold held by each country in the world. The movement of gold can be, and is, controlled by the big world bankers. When we consider that 12 banks in the United States two years ago had resources of over $20,000,000,000, which is practically twice the amount of the world's supply of monetary gold, it is very apparent that the movements of gold will be directed in accordance with profitable business for the banking systems. Big bankers will always insist that gold is the only proper basis on which to found the currency of any country. They will always insist that a currency based on any other value than that of gold will be a failure.

Gold should not be discarded for use in connection with our money or exchange system. Its purchasing power should be fixed and regulated in relation to the commodity index price of the things most commonly used in trade. If this is not done, there will be a constant fluctuation and change in commodity prices because of the maldistribution of gold.

EFFECT OF GOLD STANDARD

If you ask me why trade and business was active and prosperous during the time up to October, 1929, notwithstanding the fact that industrial and commercial inflation had reached a point entirely out of proportion to the world's monetary gold supply and out of proportion to intrinsic values, I would tell you that the public confidence had not been shaken at that time. Business had not stopped to take an inventory of itself. Everyone was absorbed in his own plans and schemes. The United States and the trading world were moving their forces continually out and onward from a base of gold stability, taking no thought of it ever being necessary to make a retreat to that stronghold. Everyone was so wholly absorbed in his plans and undertakings that he could only see larger scales, larger quotas, and expanded accomplishments for next year over the present. No time was taken for reflection. We said, "Prosperity is everywhere." The mass mind felt that continuous sailing through unending calm was inevitable. No thought of financial clouds on the horizon. No break in this spell seemed possible. Finally the storm came. We were shocked, then terrified. Some tried to remain strong and refused to believe it. Others weakened and became panicky. We all came to a realization that a new day was upon us. Men cast about to readjust themselves to rougher financial weather. They were forced to turn and join the general retreat, to where? It did not clearly appear, but retreat and salvaging such as might be saved were inevitable. Finally we realized only gold, of all things men possessed, could remain fixed and stable in value, for under our system it alone had been made by statute the yardstick of all measures of value. Every necessary or usable thing owned, desired, or possessed by man must now seek out gold and learn of it what price should be placed on each thing. Men sought to convert their possessions into the things that had been the accepted landmarks of value through generations.

Gilt-edge securities, real property of established value, things of the most necessary kind for the maintenance of life, and our social structure—these too went down, down, down in the market. Then they turned to Government bonds and found that these also on the market had lost $10 on every $100 of their value. And what is the answer? There is unquestioned utility in the things men own. Food must always be provided. Clothing, fuel, and shelter must, of necessity, be had to sustain life. Labor, the greatest source of wealth of any nation, must go on. While all the things needed by man are available, yet for some mysterious reason that can not be explained, the owner of one property who desires to dispose of it and purchase something else can not do so. Millions of laborers are walking the streets and roaming from town to town, from one part of the country to another seeking employment, but can find nothing to do. They and their families are forced by our arrangement of currency and system of exchange to remain idle, hungry, and cold in the midst of an overproduction of the things they need. Why?

The gold standard must measure everything—

And of forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard (25.8 grains of gold, nine-tenths fine), and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity. (U. S. Stat.)

All paper currency, bank notes, Federal Reserve notes silver, and even copper money potentially become gold. All public and private contracts calling for dollars must be paid in money that is potentially gold. The $702,533,000,000 bank clearances in this country, in 1929 were in each item measured by gold and payment could have been demanded in gold.

When business saw that gold was the only thing that could be depended on for stability under our currency and valuing system, a mad rush was made on every hand to get gold, or the next best thing to it if gold could not be had. The country had sailed with favorable winds on a calm sea, taking little account of to-morrow until it had piled up mountains of obligations. The partial-payment plan of merchandising had become so general that billions in obligations of all kinds had become a fixed charge on the future earnings of the people. Add to this, $35,000,000,000 of real-estate obligations payable on the annual-payment plan, often representing inflated cost of construction and inflated loans, tremendous amounts of other annual obligations, insurance premiums, taxes to meet more than $33,000,000,000 bonded national, State, county, and municipal debts, and to these, current expenses, and we see more truly the picture. All of our property values and all of our obligations must be measured by gold. Usability and utility fade into insignificance in measuring values. Gold alone can do that.

FARM RELIEF BY REGULATING CURRENCY BASE

For years every group of affected producers has been trying to find a way to save itself from undependable price conditions. Marketing has been the problem. Cooperative marketing associations have tried to find a way out for wheat growers, cotton growers, livestock producers, and the producers of almost all other kinds of commodities, all to no avail. Congress has spent 10 years debating Federal farm relief. It enacted the McNary-Haugen farm relief bill to be vetoed by the President. Then it followed with the Federal Farm Board act. The Farm Board has spent most of $500,000,000 and gotten nowhere. If Congress had devoted but a fraction of the time it has used in considering Federal farm relief bills to the consideration of a sound and dependable, scientific currency base in relation to true values—the utility value of necessary commodities—and had enacted laws to put such sound-money base into effect, farm relief would automatically have come long ago.

So would relief have come to the producers of all commodities of trade and to laborers who assist in carrying on trade. Permanent farm relief can not be provided by cooperative marketing associations, nor by boards set up by Congress to assist in withholding products from the market, nor can farm relief come by laws limiting acreage to be planted, nor by any other legislative crops, all of which, in the fundamentals of their workings, undermine the purpose they are set up to accomplish. These remedies are but salves on the symptoms of the trouble and can do no permanent good.

When we realize that our national wealth has dropped from $400,000,000,000 in 1929 to less than $300,000,000,000 at the present time and that the annual national income has fallen from $90,000,000,000 since three years ago to less than $60,000,000,000 now; that our foreign and domestic trade has suffered in the same proportion, we must know that mere legislature palliatives and appropriations of public funds can do little to bring permanent results. Cycles of inflation followed by periods of oppression and ruin will continue until the financial trouble is corrected at its base. The unvarying gold dollar of 25.8 grains of gold will not do it. It is not dependable as "the measure of value" or "yardstick of trade." A few years ago it would buy but one-half bushel of wheat. To-day it will buy four times that much, or 2 bushels of wheat. Not long ago it would buy 3 pounds of cotton. To-day it will buy 20 pounds of cotton, and so on through the list of commodities. No merchant could long remain in business with any such undependable yardstick, measure, or weighing device. He would not know whether business was gaining or losing. Neither can the business of our country know whether it is gaining or losing. It will always be thus as long as our currency remains on its present gold-standard arrangement.

GOLD NOT DEPENDABLE AS MEASURE OF VALUES

Gold is not now and never has been dependable as a measure of values and there is where our trouble lies. Between 1789 and 1809, the value of gold as related to commodities fell to just one-half of what it was at the beginning of that period. From 1809 to 1849, gold ascended in value two and one-half times what it was at the beginning of that period. From 1849 to 1873, gold dropped to three-fourths of what it was in 1849. From 1873 to 1897, gold appreciated 25 per cent in value. From 1897 to 1914, the purchasing power of gold dropped two-thirds of what it was in 1897. Since 1914, the purchasing power of gold has been so eratic and undependable that it will be necessary to consult the wholesale commodity price index in order to determine its purchasing power at any particular time. At the present time the purchasing power of gold in relation to commodity prices is almost 50 per cent higher than it was during 1929.

RELIEF FOR BANKS BY STABILIZING CURRENCY BASE

Under the present plan of bank set-ups in this country, it is necessary for banks to make loans and investments and to take risks in order to make money, while at the same time it is also necessary for banks to keep liquid assets and a back-log, or reserve, of dependable securities and paper which can be quickly converted into cash so that runs on the bank or other emergencies may be met. These two contradictory requirements, making loans and investments and at the same time keeping sufficiently liquid, are indeed difficult enough to balance in ordinary times. Our banking system will be in danger unless we continue to have a large outstanding bonded national debt. United States Government bonds in the portfolio of a bank are the best insurance against disaster it can carry. Our Government has always had a bonded debt outstanding except in one period of its history, 1837. During that period the banking structure collapsed from one end of the country to the other. Government bonds are, in effect, a mortgage against the national credit. Their value depends on the proportion of bonds outstanding to the national wealth, or the value of things owned by the people.

A currency with a gold base, valued in relation to commodities, their utility, supply, and demand, would relate directly to the current wealth of the Nation. Such a scientific arrangement would bring about a situation in which it would not be necessary for bank stabilization purposes to carry a large bonded national debt. When commodity prices became stabilized banks would take mortgages on things of dependable value. It would no longer be necessary for honestly and efficiently managed banks, small or large, to close their doors in failure. Banks do not fail until the country around them fails. It is only when the security they hold has shrunken in value and produced the condition that prevails throughout our country to-day that banks must cease to do business.

BILLS BEFORE CONGRESS TO CORRECT EVIL

Bills are now before Congress which, if enacted into law, would beyond a doubt correct our undependable monetary bases. In principle these are approved by almost every leading economist and expert on money who is not engaged in the banking business where his profits largely depend on the continuation of our present gold currency base.

TWO GREAT OBSTACLES IN WAY OF PASSING LEGISLATION

There are two great obstacles in the way of passing such legislation. One is that the international bankers of the world and the large bankers in our own country will oppose it, as they vigorously opposed the adoption of the Federal reserve system and as they are now opposing the Glass bill in the Senate, which bill seeks to supply the reserve system with better machinery to deal with credit. The banks will ridicule the proposals and treat them with contempt, declare them absurd and "unscientific." Great is the power of the financial institutions of the country!

Another obstacle that stands in the way of the enactment of such provisions into law is the lack of general knowledge necessary to give us the assurance that we are proceeding in the right direction. Questions relating to this subject are technical and require much study to be understood. We are always inclined to "rather bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of."

Not long ago, I was reading in an old history of Greece. I came across this significant and philosophical language:

> The Greeks did not use the name by which we know them but called their country Hellas and themselves Hellenes. Those nations whose speech they could not understand they called barbarians.

This is the philosophy of human life. Things that are not understood are depreciated and not appraised at their true worth, even before any effort is made to understand them. It is easy to criticize.

Congress knows there is a great wrong being perpetrated in the financial world against the people. Business is stagnant. Factories are closed. Millions of laborers are out of work and out of funds. Bread lines are extended. Public charity in the cities is being taxed beyond its capacity. Hunger and want are in evidence everywhere, while the farms are glutted with surplus. Thrifty, hardworking people are being sold out of house and home under the hammer, and savings of a lifetime are swept away. All this misery, poverty, and distress exists in a land of plenty.

CAPITALISTIC SYSTEM

The greatest enemy the capitalistic system faces to-day is the effort of the metropolitan banking fraternity and the venders of international credits to saddle on the backs of the masses the burdens created by gold. Russia is trying an experiment in government antagonistic to the capitalistic system. Our Government seems to have reached the place where it has no effective plan to offer whereby the people may be made secure in their peace, happiness, and property holdings.

I appeal to each of you, as fellow Members of Congress, to join us in trying to find a permanent solution for this overwhelming calamity.

SECRETARY OF COMMERCE HOOVER MAKES APPEAL

Secretary of Commerce Hoover said in 1921:

There is no economic failure so terrible in its import as that of a country possessing a surplus of every necessity of life in which numbers willing and anxious to work are deprived of those necessities. It simply can not be if our moral and economic system is to survive. * * * What our people wish is the opportunity to earn their daily bread, and surely in a country with its warehouses bursting with surpluses of food, of clothing, and with its mines capable of indefinite production of fuel, with sufficient housing for comfort and health, we possess the intelligence to find the solution. Without it our whole system is open to serious charges of failure.

The Secretary of Commerce 10 years ago pointed out a distressing, recurring evil. Let us hope that now, as President of the United States, he will come forward and join us in a plan that will mean the permanent solution of the evil that will always continue until it is settled fundamentally and settled right.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BEEDY].

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish it were always possible to discuss legislation of this type calmly and dispassionately. Previously at this session of Congress I have expressed my respect for the attitude which the Democratic Party has taken in its effort to legislate for the well-being of the country. I think that party has shown a degree of patriotism seldom exhibited except under the exigencies of war. I regret that any note of partisanship should have crept into the discussion of this legislation.

I am in hearty accord with the statement that the bankers of the country have made very grave mistakes.

There is no thoughtful man who will say that there has not been in the last few years a very grave abuse of credit. But, my friends, these mistakes amounting to a perversion of the Federal reserve system were not made by any party, nor were the bankers who committed them confined to any party.

Let us, therefore, discard all attempts to drag partisanship into this discussion. Let us rise to the high level of the gentleman from Alabama, beloved by both sides of the House, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], who recently said that he would always place country above party.

I think the chairman of our committee has risen to a high level of statesmanship in consideration of this legislation. I desire to commend both him and his colleagues on the committee for their evident nonpartisanship.

There have been some misstatements made in the course of this afternoon's debate. As I listen to our debates in these days and observe the faces of the men and women who gather in the gallery, I sometimes fear for reckless statements made in the heat of debate.

If there is anybody here this afternoon who has gathered from the discussion of the pending bill that this country is insolvent, that our banks are all insolvent, let me assure him there is no ground in fact for any such conclusion. [Applause.]

Now to the working, more especially to the last section in the bill. How does gold get in and out of the Federal reserve system? The gentleman from Nevada requested that we take a $10 Federal reserve note and show how this bill will affect it. Let us illustrate in another way.

How much gold is there in the Federal reserve system today? There are $2,967,000,000 in round numbers. There are in the hands of the Federal reserve agent $2,128,000,000 of gold, as against a total outstanding issue of Federal reserve notes in the amount of $2,661,000,000. There are outstanding in member banks, distributed to those banks by the Federal reserve agent but not yet paid into circulation, an additional $260,000,000 of Federal reserve notes.

Under the law 40 per cent of the reserve against outstanding Federal reserve notes must be gold and an additional 100 per cent consists of eligible paper. What has happened that should occasion the necessity for this legislation? You will observe that the gold reserve against Federal notes now outstanding is approximately 80 per cent. Banks now pursuing what is undoubtedly a wise course, more particularly the larger banks, realizing that they should perhaps fortify themselves for further emergency, have held back rediscountable paper. In other words, they have not been willing to put out their assets, borrow money on them, lend that money, and encourage what they fear might lead to further difficulty. Senator GLASS told me the other day that he had it on good authority that in the banks of the Federal reserve system there were three and one-quarter billions of rediscountable paper that were being held against an emergency.

There are also balances here subject to withdrawal by nations abroad. France may call to-morrow, if she wishes, for $450,000,000. There is no necessity for veiling this situation. There should be no fear in it. What would happen if France wanted her gold? She would immediately get in touch with her correspondent bank. That bank would call for its balances in member banks of the Federal reserve system. Those member banks would in turn go to the Federal reserve banks and borrow. With what? With this three and a quarter billions of rediscountable paper. The borrowing member banks would thereupon be credited on the books of the Federal reserve banks honoring the loans with the amount of the loans.

The Federal reserve banks in turn would deliver the 100 per cent of discountable paper received from the borrowing member banks to the Federal reserve agent. That agent would take it and place it with the reserves required against outstanding Federal reserve notes. He would thereupon issue Federal reserve notes in the amount of the rediscountable paper received, thereby releasing a corresponding amount of gold. This operation might be continued but never to the extent of releasing enough gold to reduce the reserve below the 40 per cent requirement. Gold thus released would thereupon go abroad to satisfy foreign balances in the case referred to. If the loans negotiated by the member banks are for local needs, rediscountable paper would likewise be left with the Federal reserve agent, and he would issue notes while a corresponding amount of gold would be kept at home in the Federal reserve system. There are plenty of assets to be availed of, but the banks have been saying, "We do not want to let our paper go. When it is gone we will have nothing more to fall back upon." That is probably prudent. So in this legislation in recognizing the great psychological factor of the present situation, we in effect say, "Very well, in addition to using your eligible paper to meet demands to be made within one year you may resort to Government bonds which you own and take them, in addition to rediscountable paper, to the Federal reserve agent for further issue of Federal reserve notes with the attendant release of gold." Thus we say in effect that foreign creditors may realize upon their gold balances at any time and leave plenty of gold available for further extensions of domestic credit.

Some say that this bill is inflationary. What is inflation? Any dictionary will tell you it is undue or unwarrantable increase. An unwarrantable increase in prices is price inflation. Everyone here knows that commodity prices are far below normal. I think agricultural products have fallen 52 per cent in the last 18 months. If by easing credit we increase confidence and dispel fear, we shall observe a resulting flow into rediscount channels of hoarded rediscountable paper, with a resultant issuance of Federal reserve notes. Business would thus naturally be stimulated, labor reemployed, prices restored, and labor should soon find itself in a position to participate in increased wages. By this legislation we hope to assist in bringing conditions back to normal. There is nothing inflationary in such a program, because there is no undue or unwarrantable element in that which is normal. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, by this time the juice has been squeezed out of the orange of this debate pretty thoroughly. I do not think there is very much more which can be said in favor of the bill, and I know of nothing which can be said against it. I share in the belief of my honored and distinguished chairman that this bill is not a cure-all by any means. If we are to cure the conditions under which the United States and the world are laboring to-day, we must do it by waiting for the slower working of economic laws rather than by man-made legislation, and we must go back to the war and to the days that followed it if we are to reach the roots of the depression which holds the world in its grip to-day. I believe that this bill, supplementary to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, which was passed here the other day, will be of immense benefit to this country in any legislative attempt to lift us out of the depression.

I am certain that the membership of my Committee on Banking and Currency have acted in an absolutely nonpartisan way, and have acted patriotically and quickly upon this bill. It should pass the House of Representatives to-day, and it should become a law immediately. It will free in this country forces which will be to the infinite advantage not only of the banker, not only of the man of business, but of the farmer and the working man as well. It is a bill which has been carefully prepared, one which, I believe, in common with certain others should have been passed long ago in some form, but the bill is rightly conceived and the country demands its passage.

The hearings held by the committee were charged by one gentleman as inadequate. A reading of the testimony taken shows that the hearings were of ample length to demonstrate the urgent necessity of a quick passage of the bill. Business has a right to demand that the Federal reserve limitations on credit, sufficient at the time they were made law, be liberalized so as to permit for credit uses securities once ineligible, although of the soundest character. Among the new eligible securities the better class of real-estate mortgage will be included. It is a strange thing that for so long a time such securities have been banned as noneligible.

This bill, with the other relief proposals of the administration, will, I am sure, go far toward hastening the end of depression in the United States. The whole program of the President has been constructive. No other statesman in a world gone awry has presented a plan of legislation for any country which can compare with President Hoover's.

I hope the bill may become law without delay. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this heroic financial measure, as I view it, is to check the progressive deflation that has been going on ever since Great Britain, on September 20 last, suspended gold payments. That condition has been accentuated by the action of the French Government in withdrawing some of its ear-marked gold from this country. Some of you will recall that immediately following the action of Great Britain in suspending gold payments it was necessary for our representatives abroad to assure the foreign governments that there was no purpose, as far as our Government was concerned, to go off the gold basis. Foreign governments were apprehensive that this country also might be forced to suspend gold payments. Their alarms were quickly allayed, for our Government was so fortified by its large gold holdings that even if France had withdrawn its billion of earmarked gold it would not have impaired our gold basis.

This bill does not seek in any wise to militate against the established policy of this Government to continue on a gold basis. It does seek to bring about a remedy for the condition occasioned by the industrial depression that has been going on the last 18 months, whereby the great business and industrial concerns have not been borrowing from the banks as they were wont to do when business was prosperous and accordingly have not been issuing commercial paper. So the $2,925,000,000 of Federal reserve notes in circulation on Friday last, as shown by the Federal reserve statement, instead of being backed by the required minimum of gold, 40 per cent, have 66 per cent, with only 34 per cent of negotiable paper. It is by this bill purposed to permit the substitution of Government bonds in lieu of the excess quota of gold to make up the shortage of commercial paper that is required to back those Federal reserve notes to the amount of 100 per cent, and also to permit other kinds of negotiable paper and collateral than now authorized to back the notes as security.

Under the existing law the only character of negotiable paper that is accepted for rediscount by the Federal reserve banks is negotiable commercial paper and certain paper of farm organizations. I hope I am not offending the sensibilities of the erudite gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. LUCE, who upbraided somewhat severely some members of the committee on public safety for speaking on this question, and then informed us so very lucidly on the subject under consideration, that I could not determine whether he had elucidated the question to any marked extent. Against these $2,925,000,000 Federal reserve notes in circulation at the present time, there is discountable paper amounting to $983,000,000, or 34 per cent of the total, and $1,936,000,000 of gold, or, as I said, 66 per cent of the total issue. Under this act, if it is passed, only $1,195,000,000 of gold, releasing $700,000,000, will be required, the difference, or $700,000,000 in amount, being replaced by Government bonds and other kinds of securities.

I was about to say that under the existing Federal reserve act—and I had the pleasure of being in Congress and supported Mr. CARTER GLASS when he was chairman of that committee during the administration of President Wilson, in putting through that great progressive measure that has stayed panics for these many years—only 90-day commercial paper is permitted to be eligible, when, generally, commercial paper is for from five to six months. This bill also seeks to broaden the character of negotiable paper, which may be offered as security for these Federal reserve notes. These are critical times. Panicky fear has seized part of the investment public. Large amounts of money, in some financial centers, are being withdrawn from circulation. The conditions require heroic treatment. This bill could not be justified in normal times, because some of the security that is offered for Federal reserve notes, though perfectly sound, is not of liquid character, such as bonds and mortgages. But hard cases require exceptional treatment. I justify this only as a temporary expedient, and hope that at the end of the year the crisis that requires this extraordinary dosage will have ended.

Now the high purpose of this bill is not to create inflation but to check deflation. The Milwaukee banks have liquidity above 40 per cent, but they are hesitant about making further loans.

They do not know what the future may be. We have not had a bank failure in Milwaukee except one minor political bank, and that is about to be reorganized. Our banks are essentially sound, but this bill is to lift the fear and apprehension of the bankers so that they may know that they will be able to have additional means of credit by putting up Government bonds instead of gold, and thereby secure an increase of Federal reserve notes, bringing back, as far as the issuance of Federal reserve notes is concerned, that condition that will return times to normalcy, but not a condition that will bring about that abnormalcy when, just before the panic broke, there were hundreds of millions of bank credits based upon brokers' notes.

The danger is that if some heroic means are not taken now, this period of depression will go on until many sound banks will fail. During the past six months I know of banks which were sound which were obliged to go under because they could not get relief from their sister banks, because the latter feared they must protect themselves rather than to go to the relief of some bank that had ample security but could not transfer it to liquid form.

This bill seeks primarily to enable banks to get something that they have not got to-day, a large amount of additional credit through the issue of a larger amount of Federal reserve notes; that is, to utilize their Government bonds in place of gold, and to use other kinds of negotiable paper, to the end that business conditions may be improved, commerce may be enlarged, and employment may be increased. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TIERNEY].

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, I want to say a word in support of this bill. I have a feeling that this particular measure, while it is intended to be in aid of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law, really stands on its own feet. I think this is a very sound financial measure; and while it is intended only to operate as an emergency measure for one year, to meet an emergency situation, it could go on even farther and answer a very good, permanent, sound financial purpose in the country.

We are in a position now where, under the peculiar condition of our banks—and may I speak more particularly of the banks in my section of the country, because no bank in Fairfield County, Conn., is insolvent or in suspension—we are in a position where we have ample reserve funds on hand. The business men and business interests of my district who want to resume more active business or extend their business further are in a position where they can not draw on banks, because the banks are holding a cash reserve to meet the possible emergency of a run. Though we have had none and expect none.

This particular measure will do this: It will permit the banks of my district to group together and meet these proposed new conditions of the Federal reserve system, so that five banks can get together and combine their securities, such as they feel sufficient, issue what is called a clearing-house receipt, and borrow on it from the Federal reserve banks. In other words, they will be in a position where they can take the mortgages they have in their banks, they can take the municipal bonds, notes of the cities, the State bonds, the town notes or tax warrants, turn them in, and borrow cash on them for municipal, town, and State, or business or other uses.

Mr. FIESINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TIERNEY. I yield.

Mr. FIESINGER. I have been perplexed about that very thing, namely, five member banks being allowed to go in and put up securities. What is the incentive for their doing that when there is a provision in section 2 of the bill to the effect that an individual bank may borrow money upon security which does not represent rediscountable paper.

Mr. TIERNEY. I understand that the individual bank must have the consent of a majority of the board of the Federal reserve bank, but in the case of the five banks they can simply take whatever security they see fit and present it and draw against it in cash.

Mr. FIESINGER. In the one case it requires action on the part of the Federal Reserve Board and in the other case it does not?

Mr. TIERNEY. Yes. In the one case five banks can go in, present their securities, and draw the cash, while in the other case the action of a majority of the board is required.

In my part of the United States, as well as in other parts, there are cities in a position where they can not realize on their notes, where they can not realize on their tax warrants, where they can not realize on their bonds in order to pay their pay rolls, pay their policemen, laborers, teachers to keep the towns and cities going. That is a condition which applies to my district and to a large number of districts in the country. This particular measure will allow the local banks, which are perfectly solvent and that would like to loan to the cities and towns, to group together, or even acting alone, with good security, to go to the Federal reserve bank and obtain the cash they need. In this way our cities and our towns and municipalities may function in a fair and orderly way, and in that way the good financial name of our cities and communities will be kept up. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I rarely address the House. To-day I feel constrained to make a few remarks.

When the information was given the House, shortly after its assembly this noon, that the Speaker would recognize the chairman of the committee for the purpose of moving to suspend the rules and pass this measure, we had one more instance of frantic haste in considering measures of the greatest importance. We have done so since the beginning of the session, and this latest one has disturbed me deeply.

Having intimations through the press that this measure might be crowded forward, as it is being advanced, some of us have done what we could to inform ourselves regarding the bill. I have personally been trying to assemble reliable information through hearings, through reports, through the study of the companion measure in the Senate, through reading the financial pages in daily papers, through conferences with men in whose judgment I have confidence, and otherwise.

I have tried to understand the measure. I have tried to feel in sympathy with its purpose. I do not think I shall dare to vote against it this afternoon, yet I have a profound feeling of dissatisfaction with and resentment against a system which forces us to consider these measures in such haste and to delegate our powers and authority where we should not as Members of Congress, in view of our oaths of office, delegate them. [Applause.] I have sometimes the feeling of being in the position of the man who said of his comrades that they were all out of step but himself. Yet these feelings, it seems to me, are justifiable unless more of us protest this practice of dealing with major measures in great haste.

To me it is not a satisfactory reply to be told, as I was told, that after all these are technical things; that we should take the word of some one else—and that some one else often entirely removed from this branch of government—and pass these things, approve them blindly. That is not my idea of the duty of a legislator in this body.

I am going to vote for this measure with some misgivings and with vigorous protest.

I fervently hope the leadership of this House, on measures of such consequence and importance, will in the future permit a fuller expression, will permit a better understanding, and will permit more liberal provisions for the exercise of the rights we have as Members of Congress to discuss and amend. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I add:

We who desired to delay consideration of this measure for only a little while in order to inform ourselves more fully had no choice in adoption of plans of the leadership of the House for action, unless it might have been described as Hobson's choice.

Objection to the arrangement would only have served to restrict to 40 minutes, equally divided between the two sides, the time for debate on the bill. In no case could there have been the privilege of amending or of offering amendments under the customary 5-minute rule.

It may well be noted that procedure to-day is a far cry from the original purposes for which suspension of rules came into being. In the early part of a session, for considering a measure little known or understood, acting on advice of a committee that had heard the convincing part of its testimony in secret and that, for perhaps proper reasons, refused to acquaint the House with any part of that testimony, I deplore the resort to this legislative expedient and hope that this bill is the last measure of its kind to be so considered. I hope the House will not regret the action it is taking to-day, and in which I am reluctantly taking part.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, prior to 1925 the great corporations of the country, large and small, had commercial paper which was eligible for rediscount at the Federal Reserve banks. You all know that during the period prior to 1929 these corporations sold vast amounts of securities and secured capital for the transaction of their business. To-day the great corporations of the country, large and small, have more cash on hand than they have ever had in the history of the country. They are discounting their bills and taking their discounts. Consequently, there is very little commercial paper floating, and very little eligible paper for rediscount in the Federal reserve banks.

Two years ago when we had our hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee I advocated a liberalization of the Federal reserve act so that other paper might be made rediscountable, but the idea did not win very much favor with the bankers that came before the committee.

Mr. SIROVICH. What other kind of paper?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I advocated good municipal bonds, for one thing.

Now the situation is that there has been withdrawn from the banks and hoarded about one billion and a half of currency. As this money is withdrawn and hoarded, the banks have to go to the Federal reserve to get the money to take its place. They have exhausted their rediscountable securities because very few rediscountable securities were in existence by reason of the fact that corporations no longer needed to issue them, and therefore it becomes necessary to broaden the powers under the Federal reserve act with respect to rediscountable paper so that the banks can get the currency to take the place of the hoarded money.

In my judgment, just as soon as the people of the country find that the banks have available channels in which to secure money to offset any money that may be hoarded, this hoarded money will come back into the banks, and when it does come back into the banks, the banks will have money to lend for the revival of business, and business will have an opportunity to employ labor, and we will get back to a normal business condition such as we had prior to the commencement of the hoarding of this vast amount of money. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, I am going to give a reason for being against this bill that has not been given. My reason is this: This is supposed to be a deliberative body. It is not a deliberative body. It is a body that is carrying out the will of groups that meet secretly, and after they decide what they want, they bring it in and tell us what to do.

I care not how meritorious this measure may be, we should have a proper length of time for the Members of this body to understand it. This bill should not be railroaded at this time, and I would not care if it were drawn by George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Woodrow Wilson, and both the sainted McKinley and Lincoln, if brought in in this manner, I would vote no.

The record shows that the bill was ordered printed on February 13. That was Saturday. Sunday has intervened, and now we are confronted with a rule which compels the Members of this House to vote yes or no on the bill instanter.

If I were a member of the General Assembly of the sparsely populated State of Nevada and anyone should undertake to railroad through a piece of legislation like this, I would vote no. But I am sure that Nevada's rules and laws would not permit it to be done.

Congress has been in session since the 5th of December. We have not been permitted to pass on any measure purposed to relieve distress except those which have emanated from conferences held by bankers, the administration, and a selected few Members of Congress. All is in posthaste after reaching this body; no time for deliberation here.

Who are these gentlemen who represent this body secretly? Are they our representatives? When does their duty to this body commence and when does it end? I say they should report back information obtained, and if General Dawes said the things he is said to have said, then we ought to know it as well as they. I am tired of listening to a lot of conferees saying, "If you only knew what I know." Well, why in the devil should not we know it and everybody else in America know it? [Applause.]

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SHANNON. Is this the gentleman who used the word "patriotism" a short time ago? How often that word is used. It is always a patriotic duty when one is serving the dollar. Patriotism! I am not standing as a patriot on this occasion, I am standing as a humble Member of this Congress.

Mr. BEEDY. I join the gentleman in his stand. I think in humility of spirit one can serve to a greater extent than in a spirit of arrogance. But I want to say to the gentleman that if I could repeat, what a long-standing rule of ethics forbids, just what General Dawes said in the conference at the White House, the gentleman would stand up and cheer with every man in this House. General Dawes is a fine, outstanding American, and he wants to serve his country in this hour of its trouble.

Mr. SHANNON. Who? The gentleman means General Dawes?

Mr. BEEDY. Yes.

Mr. SHANNON. He commenced serving the party, the gentleman's party, to my recollection, way back in 1896, and he has been a faithful servant of the Republican Party all this time. [Applause.] I know Mr. Dawes politically as well as the gentleman does. I should like the gentlemen who represent our side to also know Mr. Dawes's politics.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Speaker, did the time of the gentleman who interrupted me come out of my time? If so, let me have a minute or two more.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. SHANNON. The press of yesterday—I read from the Washington Herald—has three most enlightening articles on this subject. First, a telegram from London which says that the Glass-Steagall Federal reserve credit bill is a step in economic recovery. On the same page is an article from Paris which says that the people in Paris believe that the Glass-Steagall bill will bring a revival of prosperity. Then over in a corner of the same page we read that Speaker GARNER, yesterday, had under consideration passage of the bill under a rule permitting only 40 minutes' debate.

Mr. TABER. Let me say to the gentleman, I saw it in the paper last Thursday.

Mr. SHANNON. On Thursday, just four days ago, the Washington News announced that Mr. CARTER GLASS, whose name was put on the bill, said that the bill to which his name was attached was not in accordance with his understanding. If it was not within the understanding of Senator GLASS, then why the effort to railroad it at this time? Why are we, as a deliberative body, asked to pass on a measure without a full presentation of the facts? Is the interest of Paris and of London sufficient for America's purposes? I say that the people of London and Paris know more about this measure than do my constituents. [Applause.]

Patriotism is a great catchword that serves to cheer multitudes on in a quick service in the interest of money changers, which always results in injuring the masses.

Our ancestors came away as emigrants from the standing armies, aristocracies, monopolies, and debts of Europe, and now their offspring in America are faced with every form of direct and indirect taxation for the support of the very system from which their ancestors fled.

The last 11 years of the administration of this Government, due to its combination with the Big Rich, should be designated as national villainy, and will be by future historians.

It seems to me that money assumes the prerogative of ruling the people and defying the laws of the land. It walks boldly into this legislative Hall and arrogates all of the rights, powers, and immunities of supreme lawgiver. No class of the people receives legislative consideration except money brokers and paper shavers. In other words, the men who brought about this financial debacle are the only ones receiving consideration.

These money changers, European, local, and international, with the keen scent that vultures follow the camps of moving armies, are following the action of this body for the purpose of fattening on the offal.

Ten years ago, yea, four years ago, Coolidge, Hoover, Mellon, all would have cried out that this great saturnalia of debt was a national blessing, and I am afraid many Americans would have agreed with them.

It appears to me that capital has placed a yoke upon the neck of the people, and the people have tamely submitted to the indignity. The real duty now on the part of the administration should be the taking care of the poor who have not, and who have been ruined by this international bankers' creation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, the question before us this afternoon is inflation of the currency. We do not have a bill before us requiring inflation; the bill merely gives the Federal Reserve Board additional powers to inflate if the members of that board desire to use the powers so given. This board has had plenty of authority to inflate under the present law; or, I should say, has had plenty of power to prevent deflation. It has not exercised that authority but on the other hand has done more to deflate the country and bring about all the misery and distress that have followed than any other known agency. I am not so much interested in giving this board additional powers, that it does not need, as I am in passing a law that will absolutely require inflation and the keeping in circulation at all times sufficient money to enable the people to do business. We seem to have an overproduction of everything except money. The Federal Reserve Board has charge of the money crop.

I thoroughly agree with anyone who says that inflation is necessary to bring back commodity prices. The question in my mind, should inflation come about this way, or should inflation come about in a different way. We all agree that there should be inflation.

It is also argued that we should at least have 40 per cent of gold reserve to back up our currency paper money. For the purposes of this discussion I thoroughly agree that we ought to have 40 per cent gold behind our money. If we permit the Federal reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board to inflate the currency, as contemplated in this bill, it is restricted to the extent that it shall always be backed up by 40 per cent gold. Under this bill, however, the other 60 per cent can be the watered stocks and bonds of an insolvent corporation.

Why should we turn to the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks in order to have inflation? I have before me a statement of the Treasury of the United States. There is a gold fund in the United States Treasury that is owned by the Federal reserve banks, amounting to $1,571,000,000. That amount subtracted from the total amount of gold on deposit in the United States Treasury of $3,495,000,000 leaves about $2,000,000,000, which is a sufficient gold reserve, that belongs to the United States Treasury, to justify the issuance of more than two and one-half billion dollars more currency, after taking into consideration the currency that is now outstanding against this gold.

If 40 per cent gold is sufficient gold basis for the Federal reserve bank, why is it not sufficient gold basis for the Treasury of the United States? If it is sufficient, why not issue the $2,500,000,000 and pay it on our debts? If possible, it should be paid out in a way that it will reach the most people and be distributed over the largest area. If we can show that the adjusted-service certificates are due now, which we can show, and if we can show that the payment of the certificates can conveniently be made without detriment to the general welfare, which we can show, the passage of bill 1, which provides for the full and immediate cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates should be given the right of way so that moderate inflation will reach every section of the United States at one time. If inflation is brought about in this manner, the money will be placed in the hands of at least 2,500,000 veterans, who need it to buy comforts and necessities of life for themselves and families.

I tell you that the money—$2,200,000,000, which is the remainder due—can be issued by the Treasury of the United States, and these adjusted-service certificates paid in full, and we will not have inflated our currency to the extent that we will not have more than a 40 per cent gold reserve for a base. These gentlemen who are on the Banking and Currency Committee, and the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, told us the other day that a 40 per cent gold base was at all times sufficient. If it is sufficient for the Federal reserve banks, it is sufficient for the Government of the United States. So why pay interest on that money; why not pay this money out and let it go to the 3,600,000 veterans in the United States? These veterans reside in every nook and corner in America. Five out of every seven of them have borrowed 50 per cent on their certificates; if the full payment bill does not pass, these veterans will have practically all the remainder of their certificates consumed by compound interest. Which will be better for the country, the payment of this money at this time to the veterans or permitting compound interest to consume the remainder of the money due them?

Remember, this money can be paid by the issuance of currency which will have a 40 per cent gold base. The other 60 per cent will consist of Government securities. This payment will not require a bond issue, additional taxes, or the payment of interest.

The present bill is before us under suspension of the rules. No amendment can be offered. If the board exercises the powers herein given to inflate the currency, will the inflation be lasting and commodity values maintained, or will deflation be set in as soon as the election in November is over? Our instructions to the Federal Reserve Board should be more specific. Legislation of a more permanent character and more definite and certain should be passed. I know the bill is sure of passage, but I will not vote to suspend the rules and pass it. More consideration should be given to it, more debate should be allowed, and amendments should be permitted to be offered by the Members of the House. There is no necessity for invoking the "gag rule" in the passage of this legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I rise to talk shortly to you about the historic development of the idea of emergency currency in America. It is a very important subject, and the historic connection and development of it will not be without interest to this body. The Kansas City Times on July 5, 1899, carried an article with the headline, "To Prevent Periodic Panics—Plan for Expending the Currency During Financial Crises—Hon. Robert L. Owen Suggests the Issuance of Treasury Notes Against Standard Securities in Times of Panic by Which the Banks Would Force Borrowers Into Liquidation." The next step was that Mr. Robert L. Owen, then a citizen in private life, worked out the idea very carefully and submitted it to Senator Jones, who presented it to the Senate on February 6, 1900, as an amendment to the financial bill then pending before that body. That amendment was rejected. In the meantime, Robert L. Owen had become a United States Senator. He possesses one of the most brilliant, original, and well-ordered minds that it has ever been the good fortune of the American people to call into public service.

On February 25, 1908, Senator Owen offered this amendment to the then pending Aldrich bill. It was not adopted. The Federal reserve system, of which Senator Owen and Senator GLASS, then a Member of this House, were the authors, was expected to meet all of the requirements that might arise in any emergency. Unfortunately, under the method of administering that great law, it has not met those conditions. I had occasion to go through the hearings of investigations in the Congress and I ran across this idea of meeting emergencies of this character by emergency currency. I soon found and traced out the emergency-currency idea of Senator Owen, and then went to him and discussed the matter very carefully. We looked over the conditions and concluded that the Federal reserve law as at present administered and understood could not meet another emergency like the ones which occurred in 1921 and 1929, and that to meet such conditions as that it would require emergency currency. Therefore I took bodily the idea which Senator Owen had offered and introduced it into this body as H. R. 6407 on January 4, 1932.

On December 28, 1931, I had given out an interview because of the tremendously difficult conditions we were facing at that time, saying that I was going to introduce a bill of this character, and outlined the bill. That brought to me many letters from all over the United States, letters that are worth any man's while studying, offering suggestions and criticisms, and pointing out ways of safeguarding that measure. In the meantime Senator WALSH of Massachusetts had introduced an identical bill in the Senate. He and I sent out thousands of letters, to the President, to members of the Cabinet, to officers of the Federal reserve banks all over the country, and to a great number of the heads of corporations, and a great number of banks, both large and small, in all parts of America. We received back a series of letters which in due course of time I hope to be able to introduce into the RECORD by some means or other for the information of this body, because I think you gentlemen will find them of tremendous interest. After reviewing these letters with Senator WALSH, we called in Senator Owen and Mr. Carl Strover, of Chicago, one of the very able and crystal thinkers along economic lines in America.

The four of us combed over the original Owen idea, and I reintroduced the bill, as amended, as H. R. 8495, on January 27, 1932. Meanwhile I had discussed with the Speaker of the House, Mr. GARNER, with the Democratic floor leader, Mr. RAINEY, with the chairman, Mr. STEAGALL, and various members of the Committee on Banking and Currency the feasibility of presenting it here as a separate measure. I found in the meantime that my colleague, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, had presented a very similar idea. I found that a great number of other men in this body were studying with great interest and understanding the entire question of currency, which goes to the very foundation of our business possibilities. I conferred many times with them. Meantime the administration forces had been considering this matter, and at first they turned it down frankly and flatly. Three weeks ago they rejected entirely the idea of currency based on Government securities. Both the present Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary Mellon rejected it. I am glad to say that Under Secretary Mills has reversed himself as Secretary Mills and has stood for this bill.

In my interview on the 28th day of December I made the statement that if a bill of this kind should pass it would break the backbone of the panic within 48 hours.

That it did that very thing even upon the mere announcement of its probable passage you and I well know from the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] that the stock market in two days' time regained $5,000,000,000 in values out of the sixty-odd billions it has lost since the stock crash of October and November, 1929.

If this bill had been thought of and enacted during the Seventy-first Congress immediately following the stock crash of October-November, 1929, it would have exerted an immediate curative effect, and the unemployment and suffering for the last two years would have been largely mitigated.

It is an excellent illustration of what Government rightly directed may accomplish. The important fact can not be overestimated.

I want at this point to thank the chairman of the committee for the very great kindness he did me and my colleague from Maryland in giving us part of the credit due for the formation of this bill. On the other hand, I want to call attention to two things that I regret exceedingly. First, this should be a permanent bill; not a bill for one year only. That is a mistake. [Applause.] Not only that, it should not have granted to the Federal Reserve Board, or any other board, the power to annul an act of Congress, especially in relation to that vital thing, the lifeblood of our national structure in America—our currency.

With those two exceptions I heartily agree with the bill, for while my bill and the bill introduced by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] were broader in their purposes than the present bill, this bill is a step in the right direction, and I am glad to see it presented here. Because we can take the first step on solid ground toward getting out of this depression, toward putting men to work.

Permit me at this point to say that I have been granted time to talk on the general subject at length.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois an additional half minute.

Mr. KELLER. I have been granted leave to talk at length on this subject on the other steps necessary to cure our present misfortunes and to prevent a recurrence of them in the very near future. That can be done and I believe I shall be able to show you that fact.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the gentleman for tendering me the time, but my physical condition is not such as to enable me to speak on this monstrosity, so I shall render back the time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make this observation, that it is unbelievable to me that an assembly composed of 435 Members would pass legislation as important as this legislation and know as little about it as we do. [Applause.] It is a reflection on the intelligence and patriotism of the Members of the House of Representatives to pass this bill without an opportunity to study it. How many Members of this House have read the hearings? Be honest and hold up your hands. I have not. I secured a copy of the hearings and I have endeavored to read them, and I say this, and I say it with no feeling whatever, that the policy of the Comptroller of the Currency and the policy of the Federal reserve bank has compelled the little banks all over my country and all over this great Nation to collect their paper, thereby forcing the hoarding of credit, which is worse than hoarding money, and the result of the policy of the Federal reserve bank and the Comptroller of the Currency has forced the banks throughout this Nation to withhold loans from their people. I say this with all kindness to the leaders on both sides, and I say it with all kindness to every member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, who are my friends, and I respect and honor them and I love them, but why not let this Congress adjourn and go home and leave the Committee on Banking and Currency in session? That is all we need in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that to-day, when something is said about inflation of the currency, all the Members sit around and listen. The last time I used those words everybody buzzed. On last Monday, a week ago to-day, there was printed in the RECORD, on page 3539 as a part of what I tried to tell you, the true condition of all the money of the United States—the Circulation Statement of United States Money of December 31, 1931. There has not been a single speaker to-day who has given the correct relation of gold to the present currency. I will not attempt to do it, because the Members can take the statement and figure it out for themselves.

In the figures that are given you for the gold and the Federal reserve currency of this very day, the difference is so small that it is infinitesimal, but suffice it to say that with regard to this additional $1,000,000,000 worth of currency which I understand is about to be authorized, there is now available in the Federal reserve banks enough gold to authorize one-half billion dollars worth of paper money. But that need not frighten any of you, because there is plenty more gold in the Treasury. There are about $2,000,000,000 worth of gold in the Treasury against which paper has not yet been issued and plenty of paper money can be issued safely. There is plenty of good backing for this paper money. There is no need to be frightened about inflation, because, on the theory of the economists and those who write upon banking and finance, the 40-and-60 basis, 40 per cent metal and 60 per cent paper, is said to be sound. That is about the basis of our currency. We have over $5,000,000,000 in metal—gold and silver—and almost $4,000,000,000 in paper issued. We have a total of about $9,500,000,000 in all kinds of money—gold, silver, and paper—at the present time. We are on that basis. The Treasury may take the gold and put it in the Federal reserve banks, and the Federal reserve banks, with a suitable amount of any kind of eligible paper, may issue more paper money in addition to that now outstanding.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have only three minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted to correct the gentleman's statement. It is 100 per cent of paper and 40 per cent in gold. We have been hearing about this 40-60 business all the afternoon; but if the gentleman will look at the statute he will find that before issuing Federal reserve notes they must put up 100 per cent of eligible paper and 40 per cent in gold.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I am glad the gentleman corrected me, because I may be beginning to be as parrotlike as some of the rest of the Members. The total circulation of all money of our country is to-day based upon approximately 57½ per cent of gold and 42½ per cent of paper. The Federal reserve bank authorization is upon 40 per cent of gold. When I spoke last Monday I was trying to tell some of those who think that inflation or increase in currency is necessary that to increase the circulating medium owned and issued by the Government and to inflate the currency do not mean exactly the same thing to me.

To-day you are authorizing additional bankers' paper and United States bonds to be added to the class of eligible paper which has been used in our Federal reserve system to furnish money when the exigencies of business demand. The holding back by many bankers of eligible paper has held back some issue of additional paper money, but this bill permits banks which have no eligible paper to offer to-day to go through their portfolios and find other paper which is good but which did not conform to the requirements of the statute or the rules made by the Federal reserve bank thereunder.

This bill permits the paper money of this country to become as large if not larger than the foundation of metal, both gold and silver, while to-day's paper money is a structure of about the same size as the foundation of gold alone.

Those who have drafted this bill have recognized the substantial value of the silver in our money base and do not question the fact that we have sound money. The base is sound. Both the silver and the gold in it are necessary.

In other words, all you are doing here to-day is merely postponing the day for the return of the use of more silver into our money system. To-day you recognize the shortage of gold and designate a new line of credits for money use. To-morrow you will be turning to metal, and the shortage of gold and the predictions as to its decreasing production will furnish the answer to the resistance of those who to-day scoff at silver as a cheap metal and of no use in any larger amount in the money structure of the United States.

And I predict that as the paper money to be authorized by this bill comes in for redemption the students of the money structure will state that which I am inclined to state they now believe, that the quantity of silver in the metal foundation of our money may be very properly augmented, if not in an amount up to $576,691,779, being the silver unaccounted for in the circulation statement, then in an appropriate amount based upon the needs of the country and a relation of silver to gold much different than that which appears from the metal now actually on hand. If you will look over the circulation statement of December 31, 1931, as printed on page 3539 in the February 8, 1932, issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, you can figure this all out for yourselves.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 10 minutes. [Applause.] Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take up very much of your time because I have not got it. I have yielded all of the time but 12 minutes.

I regret exceedingly that on an important measure like this sufficient time has not been given to this House to properly consider it.

The first intimation I had of this particular legislation was on last October 6, when at the White House, where the Members were assembled, the question of the liberalization of the rediscount features of the Federal reserve was referred to. I understand that the first the committees of Congress knew anything in regard to this was on last Thursday, when they were given this bill practically all drawn, but in which some slight amendments have been made. It was rushed through both committees in the Senate and House, and it is here now under suspension of the rules. Fortunately, however, a little additional time has been given for its consideration on the floor. A bill of this kind should have very careful hearing and study, because there are two major problems in this very bill which go to the vitals of our whole credit system, but particularly the Federal reserve. You are, by two amendments in this bill, repealing the very foundation of the Federal reserve system. You are taking away and wiping out the safeguards of eligibility. We did not know anything about eligibility until we created the Federal reserve act. We did create eligible paper at that time, and that has been one of the safeguards of the Federal reserve system if liquidity was to be considered.

In addition to doing away with elegibility you are transferring the determination of what is eligible for rediscount in the Federal reserve system to the Federal Reserve Board. You are giving them carte blanche to rediscount any kind of paper if, in their judgment, they see fit to do so under the terms of this bill and can comply with the organization of the banks into clearing houses. You are making frozen assets in banks liquid. I simply want to call your attention to what you are doing in that respect. If it had not been for that which was intended to be given in this particular section of the Federal reserve act, I question whether the Federal reserve act would have been created.

You are doing another thing, and I want to call your particular attention to the last clause in this bill which permits the issuance of Federal reserve notes secured by Government bonds. I am sure that anyone, who will consider the debates which took place, the conferences and the study that was made prior to the enactment and at the time of the enactment of the Federal reserve act, will recognize the fact that that system was created to give elasticity to money and credit; that we were to get away from a Government-bond secured currency, and that credit would flow up and down as business and commerce rose and fell. You are now going back to Government-bond secured money. You are admitting the failure, in a crisis, of the Federal reserve system. Elasticity was what was to be gained by organization of the Federal reserve system.

I want to call your attention also to the fact that by this act you are releasing $750,000,000 worth of gold or more for the purpose of export. You are taking gold from under the present issue of $2,900,000,000 worth of Federal reserve notes and you are putting back of it the I O U's of the United States. You are going to give unlimited opportunity to the Federal Reserve Board to decide how much further they may go as regards the issuance of Federal reserve notes secured by Government bonds. I would say you are taking the lid off completely in this respect. They can issue Federal reserve notes on the demand of the Federal Reserve Board just to the extent that they have gold to cover the 40 per cent legal reserve requirement.

This is not releasing money and credit in response to the demand of trade and commerce. This money and credit is going to be placed at the beck and call of speculators, if they see fit to use it, just as it was used in 1927 and 1928.

I call your attention to that period of the greatest inflation that this country has ever known, that between 1922 and 1929, when, mind you, we inflated in this country to an extent that brought about the great disaster from which we are now suffering. We did not have to then amend the Federal reserve act to bring about inflation. Do you wish to go on a greater joy ride than then? This is something entirely new you are doing now.

I tried to find out from the members who appeared before the committee, particularly the Secretary of the Treasury, what the reason was for this legislation, why the great haste to pass this bill. Was it the demand for gold from abroad—beyond the free available gold? What were the demands from the foreigners for more gold? I could not get an answer definitely from the Secretary of the Treasury. He said he did not know, and, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask because of lack of time to place in the RECORD at this point that part of my questioning and the answers thereto of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, when he appeared before the committee last Friday, directing your attention particularly to his answers to my questions as regards the amount of gold that might be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by incorporating the matter referred to.

Mr. McFADDEN. And I would also like to include some extracts from an editorial appearing in Saturday's Commercial and Financial Chronicle pertaining to this same bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Including extracts from the paper referred to.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that is necessary, and I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, there was not any objection to the first part of the request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The request was put as one request. Does the gentleman desire to renew his request?

Mr. McFADDEN. As to the first part of it, yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania renews his request, with the omission of the matter in the paper referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection. The matter referred to is as follows, being extracts from the committee hearings on this bill under date February 12, 1932, appearing on page 25:

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Would you not, for the benefit of the committee, give us the total amount of gold in the United States, and just where it is located, and how it is located?

Secretary MILLS. I will be very glad to; the total amount is about $4,400,000,000, I think, Mr. McFADDEN; but I would be very pleased to put the figures as to how it is located and such information into the record.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; how much is in Federal reserve; how much back of Federal reserve issues?

Secretary MILLS. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. And explain also in that, if you will, please, just how the free gold—how it is free gold.

Secretary MILLS. I will be very glad to.

"Of the $4,400,000,000 of gold in the United States, about $3,000,000,000 is held by the reserve banks, the remainder being in the United States Treasury or in circulation. Of the $3,000,000,000 in the reserve banks, $2,000,000,000 must be held, under existing law, as collateral against Federal reserve notes, and an additional $550,000,000 is required as reserves against deposits, leaving about $450,000,000 of gold not required either as collateral or as reserves. This amount is known as 'free gold.'"

Mr. LUCE. Right in that connection, is there such a thing as a balance sheet for the Federal reserve system?

Secretary MILLS. Yes; the Federal reserve system publishes every week, on Thursday or Friday, a complete balance sheet. I have one here, a balance sheet issued for publication Friday morning, February 12.

Mr. LUCE. Might I look at it?

Mr. McFADDEN. May I ask this question: The testimony this morning indicated the possible withdrawal of gold from abroad; to what extent can gold be drawn out from the United States at this time?

Secretary MILLS. Do you mean what amount it might be?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. In other words, it is indicated a certain amount is on deposit; then, of course, through the sale of foreign-held acceptances they can withdraw gold, and through the sale of securities other than that, just what is indicated at this time, so that we may know?

Secretary MILLS. Mr. McFADDEN, no one can answer that question with any degree of certainty; no one knows the amount of American securities held abroad. All that anyone can answer, and answer with a great deal of confidence, is that we have on hand sufficient gold resources at home to permit us to meet all of the demands that may be made.

Mr. McFADDEN. What I was getting at particularly was the amount of foreign balances here that might be withdrawn. It is indicated France is drawing $125,000,000 now by the press.

Secretary MILLS. I do not know how much the Bank of France has on deposit in this country; they have a certain amount of gold earmarked with Federal reserve banks; they have a certain amount invested in acceptances; and they have a certain amount on current balances with commercial banks.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is not known to you, then, the amount of possible withdrawals at this time?

Secretary MILLS. By the Bank of France?

Mr. McFADDEN. By foreigners.

Secretary MILLS. I do not see, Mr. McFADDEN, how anyone could know that.

Mr. McFADDEN. Well, it was stated in September that there was a possibility of withdrawal of a very large amount of money.

Secretary MILLS. I did not see them from any responsible source; of course, anyone is entitled to speculate all he wants, but I am here as a responsible Government official, supposed to give you facts, and I will say to you I have no facts which would enable me to determine what the total withdrawals might be from the United States, from all over the world; but I do say to you that I am perfectly confident of our ability to meet all demands that may be made upon us.

Mr. McFADDEN. Without this legislation, have you that ability?

Secretary MILLS. This legislation, by making the total amount of our excess gold immediately available, strengthens our position; there is no question about that.

Mr. McFADDEN. Do you know the amount of deposit here by foreign nations and individuals?

Secretary MILLS. No; I do not, Mr. McFADDEN.

Mr. McFADDEN. The amount I was trying to get at is, it is generally understood, France can draw $400,000,000 of gold at any time she sees fit.

Secretary MILLS. I do not want to be in a remote sense discourteous, but I have already stated that I do not know those figures, and therefore I can not acquiesce in the statement that it is generally admitted; I do not know whether it is generally admitted or not; I do not know.

Mr. McFADDEN. Well, I recall now that in a conference at the White House last September or October it was stated at that conference that a very large amount of gold could be withdrawn; I wondered if the same situation exists now as existed then.

Secretary MILLS. Very considerable withdrawals took place in September; in the month of October and early November we lost some $700,000,000 of gold, as you know, and subsequently there was a return flow of gold, up to the end of the year; since the first of the year gold withdrawals have amounted to approximately $50,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. Am I correct in inferring, then, that the Treasury and the Federal reserve have no knowledge of the amount of gold that might be withdrawn within the next three months?

Secretary MILLS. I have no knowledge.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the Federal Reserve Board any knowledge?

Secretary MILLS. I have not discussed the matter with the board.

Mr. McFADDEN. I think it is important for the committee to know about that.

Secretary MILLS. I do not see that it is particularly relevant to this bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. This bill releases from under the Federal reserve agent, according to Mr. Meyer this morning, as I understood it, approximately $750,000,000 of gold.

Secretary MILLS. It might.

Mr. McFADDEN. And substitutes in lieu of the gold United States Government bonds.

Secretary MILLS. It might.

Mr. TIERNEY. What is the objection to that?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am not raising any objection; it seems to me we are entitled to some information. I am trying to find out what the emergency is, other than what we know here domestically; in the financial situation, he stated here we are relieving or attempting to restore confidence and relieve the withdrawal of money from banks. I am trying to ascertain how much foreigners have on deposit in the United States that they can withdraw, and that seems to me to be rather pertinent.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I would like to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. All right.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Is the gold on deposit by foreign governments earmarked so that it is not part of the total?

Secretary MILLS. Yes; the gold which is earmarked is not earmarked by governments, but by foreign central banks; any gold that is earmarked is excluded from any statement we have given you, just as completely as if it had left the country.

Mr. SEIBERLING. In other words, Mr. Chairman, I was asking, apparently there is to be released here $750,000,000 worth of gold from the Federal reserve agent and Government bonds substituted as security for Federal reserve notes; what is to become of the gold that is thus released; is that to go abroad or is it to remain in the Federal reserve?

Secretary MILLS. That is to be held in the vaults of the Federal reserve banks, or in the Treasury for the reserve banks, to meet the demands against the Federal reserve system provided for by law.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Part of it might be withdrawals from abroad.

Secretary MILLS. Why, very obviously, Mr. MCFADDEN, and that is elementary, it seems to me, so long as the United States remains on a gold standard our obligations are payable in gold, and anyone holding dollar obligations can demand gold—that is what being on the gold standard means; the obligations of the United States are payable in gold, and that means gold, and does not mean anything else but gold.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I wanted to inquire with regard to the free gold that is available for the rediscount purposes. Now, is it not true it would simply decrease in amount—decrease the reserves?

Secretary MILLS. To the extent that member banks discounted eligible paper with the Federal reserve banks, it would automatically free the amount of gold that is now used as cover in excess of the required reserve.

Mr. MCFADDEN. The Federal reserve agent could release to the Federal reserve bank, could it not, that excess gold at any time, so long as it kept 40 per cent?

Secretary MILLS. Yes; so long as the member banks borrowed and there was eligible paper.

Mr. MCFADDEN. As a matter of fact, the Federal reserve agent is only required to keep 40 per cent, is he not?

Secretary MILLS. Yes.

Mr. MCFADDEN. So that gives free gold now.

Mr. STEVENSON. Not unless there is 100 per cent of commercial paper up.

Mr. STEWART. They supplemented the eligible paper with gold.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Will you explain where this free gold is held now, in the hands of the Federal reserve agent or Federal reserve banks?

Secretary MILLS. In the hands of the banks or in the hands of the Treasury for account of the banks.

Mr. MCFADDEN. It is free gold in every sense of the word. Now, if gold was required to ship abroad, it could be gotten from the free gold?

Secretary MILLS. It could be gotten from the free gold to the extent, Mr. MCFADDEN, that the member banks furnish the eligible paper.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Yes. Well, now, on page 5 of this bill it provides:

"That at any time within 12 months from the date of the approval of this act, should the Federal Reserve Board deem it in the public interest, it may, upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members holding office at the time, authorize the Federal reserve banks to offer, and the Federal reserve agent to accept, as such collateral security, direct obligations of the United States."

Under that, then, am I to infer that issuance of Federal reserve notes or book credit could be set up directly by the Federal Reserve Board; in other words, in lieu of eligible paper, Government security?

Secretary MILLS. Well, they hold that now.

Mr. MCFADDEN. This enlarges that opportunity.

Secretary MILLS. It enlarges that opportunity.

Mr. MCFADDEN. In other words, we can issue Federal reserve notes secured by gold and Government obligations in lieu of eligible paper and gold?

Secretary MILLS. You are doing that to-day, but you are issuing Federal reserve notes against gold and Government obligations to-day.

Mr. MCFADDEN. But this permits it directly.

Secretary MILLS. Let me explain the situation: If a member bank borrows on a 15-day note, with Government securities as collateral, those Government securities can in turn serve as collateral against the issue of Federal reserve notes, providing the bank always has on hand 40 per cent gold reserve. What this would make available is $750,000,000 of Government bonds held by the system which have not been acquired as collateral for a loan to a member bank. Is that clear?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Well, in other words, the Federal reserve banks themselves can issue Federal reserve notes on Government bonds and gold?

Secretary MILLS. And gold; yes.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Whereas now they can only issue them to member banks on their notes secured by Government bonds and gold.

Secretary MILLS. Exactly. Of course, they do not issue currency unless there is a demand for currency.

Mr. MCFADDEN. This permits, then, the Federal reserve banks themselves to release Federal reserve notes and credit without the demand coming directly from member banks.

Secretary MILLS. Well, they can always do that, Mr. MCFADDEN.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I know that.

Secretary MILLS. Through open market operation; it does not alter that situation at all; all it does do is to release the amount of gold now held against Federal reserve notes in excess of the 40 per cent required by law.

Mr. MCFADDEN. But it does permit the Federal reserve banks themselves now to use that $750,000,000 worth of gold and put up 60 per cent of Government bonds and issue Federal reserve notes.

Secretary MILLS. It permits them to substitute Government bonds for the gold held in excess of the 40 per cent.

Mr. MCFADDEN. And there is no limit as to the amount that they might go in that respect.

Secretary MILLS. Well, the limit, of course, is the 40 per cent of gold, which is what the law contemplates.

Mr. McFADDEN. This objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts only goes to show still further how utterly impossible it is to discuss properly a measure of this kind under these conditions. It is regrettable, because there is nothing more important before this Congress than this bill. It has a tremendously far-reaching effect.

The pressing need for the enactment of this legislation indicates to me the possible large exportation of gold out of the United States. This House should have definite information on the amount of gold that can be withdrawn from the United States at this time. The countries who owe the United States $11,000,000,000 and over of international debts are in a position to withdraw gold from this country. It has been intimated both on this side and on the other side of the Atlantic that they are using the pressure of possible withdrawals of gold to secure more favorable settlement of international war debts. This is something that this House is interested in and should know. We do not know, in addition to foreign balances held here and their ability to dispose of short and long time securities which they hold, how much of our Federal reserve notes, or gold certificates, or United States notes may be held abroad and presented here to withdraw gold. If a billion and a quarter dollars' worth of gold is withdrawn from the United States within the next three months it will curtail the ability of the Federal reserve to issue further Federal reserve notes and Federal reserve credit. These are questions of vital moment and importance and affect the welfare of our people to a great extent.

Between 1922 and 1929 no legislation like this was necessary to cause the greatest inflation this country has ever known. The Federal reserve did not need this kind of authority then. I pointed out in a speech that I made recently on the floor of the House that during 1928 the Federal reserve released $60,000,000,000 worth of money that was used in stock-market speculation.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. McFADDEN. In just a moment.

Mr. BEEDY. That is so incorrect—the whole resources of all the banks of the United States never attained that proportion but once.

Mr. McFADDEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I am quoting from figures of the Federal reserve system as they stand.

Mr. BEEDY. That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. McFADDEN. I was interested in yesterday morning's papers showing how the dollar had depreciated in the exchange markets of the world because of the possible enactment of this legislation. I direct the attention of the House to the quotations on international exchange appearing in yesterday's papers.

You are releasing by this legislation gold that belongs to the people of the United States, which is now back of your Federal reserve notes, and this gold may all go abroad. You are taking off all law so far as eligible paper is concerned and leaving the rediscounting of paper to the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board. You are destroying the liquidity of the Federal reserve system by permitting the rediscount of this class of paper and you are giving to the Federal Reserve Board the right to say whether money and credit may be issued or not.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. I do not understand how the gentleman can make that statement, assuming we have 70 per cent of gold at the present time and the eligible paper——

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, we come to the consideration of this bill, it is true, rather promptly. Congress has been lampooned for 15 years, I know, because I have been here that long, for being so dilatory in its action. There is the constant complaint that we are too slow. Now, forsooth, because we have got to acting promptly the great complaint is that the membership of this House is mentally so weak that it takes it about a week in which to comprehend a 3-page bill, when it is all explained in a report of the committee. [Laughter and applause.] I regret to feel that my colleagues in this House on either side are as mentally deficient as they would have us believe. I think it is just a natural disposition to kick because they do not get time to talk enough. Well, it is not my fault that they are not getting time to talk enough.

I have not been to the White House. I have not been suborned by the head men of the Treasury and all that. As a humble Member I have sat in the Committee on Banking and Currency and have undertaken the best I could to help perfect this bill and report it out and pass it in an emergency, which is conceded on both sides of this House to exist. If anybody has got anything to say about that being treason, because we have acted promptly and acted under whip and spur when the house was afire—and a great many people know it, although some people may not catch up until after the house has burned, and would not be good members of a fire company—if anybody has got any kick to make about that or if that is treason, I plead guilty. [Applause.]

Some of the brethren say this is inflation, and one brother, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], complained that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] dodged the word "inflation" and said it was "expansion," and I take it that the gentleman wanted the word "inflation" to be used. I do not know.

This reminds me of the occasion when old John Randolph of Roanoke, the sharpest-tongued man who ever sat in either House, was complaining of what they had given him to drink at a hotel at Fredericksburg. He had a cup of something sitting before him, and the waiter came in and said, "Captain, what will you have, sir, tea or coffee?" "Well," he said, "if this is tea give me coffee, and if this is coffee give me tea." If this is deflation, give me inflation, and I will take it with the "in" emphasized. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, what does this bill do? We have had it explained admirably by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TIERNEY], who made a fine explanation of it in two or three words. I do not need to go over it. These clearing-house fellows can get together, get the money, and distribute it among themselves, putting up any collateral that is satisfactory, such as municipal and school district bonds, tax warrants, and anticipatory warrants to go into that pot, and stand behind the five or six banks that work for this civil community. That is No. 1.

Second is where the bank is saying that it can not combine with the five other banks, under the circumstances, the Federal reserve bank, on the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, which is a sufficient safeguard, can loan to that on collateral that is not eligible under the present law. Well, it is said that that will let in the stock market. It may; you can not do anything that will keep those fellows, as sharp as they are, from getting money, if there is any.

The third proposition is a simple proposition, to put up direct obligations of the United States as security for Federal reserve notes.

Now, I want to take a minute on that. A great deal of misapprehension and misinformation has been peddled out about that. Let us see how this acts. A bank in Washington goes to the Federal reserve bank at Richmond and presents there a note of a merchant here for a thousand dollars. He gets a thousand dollars. It is the note of a merchant and has the indorsement of the bank, and the Federal reserve bank takes it, and the Federal reserve agent, who represents the Government, says that there is something substantial behind every note, he takes it, and the Federal reserve agent sees the note of Mr. Jones indorsed by the Washington bank and he says, "It is all right; you have good paper there, but you can't get it that way. You have got to put $400 of gold up for every thousand dollars of Federal reserve notes in addition to your note."

Here is the situation now. This provision would let bonds be taken instead of eligible paper, because they have stopped selling eligible paper; the banks are not getting it. They do not get it. The trade is not going to manufacture cotton; it is not going to buy a thousand bales of cotton to-day with the expectation of manufacturing it, because the price is going down and down, and if a man buys a thousand bales to-day and can not manufacture it, the probability is that it will go down lower and lower, and it would be an unprofitable transaction.

The result is a contraction in business everywhere. A merchant would not buy a $10,000 stock of goods because prices are sagging every day, and he would have a loss of $1,000 in 30 days if things continue as they are. So we have not the eligible paper. We have $900,000,000 of eligible paper in the Federal reserve banks of this country, and $2,900,000,000 of Federal reserve notes out. The $900,000,000 of eligible paper and $360,000,000 in gold will take care of the $900,000,000 of Federal reserve notes, but there are $2,000,000,000 out that have to be taken care of with gold, and when you do not put up paper, you have to put up dollar for dollar with gold, and you have up $2,000,000,000 in gold, where 40 per cent would be all right, if you had the eligible paper to put up with it. Forty per cent of $2,000,000,000 is $800,000,000. You would have to have only $800,000,000 instead of $2,000,000,000 in gold, and thereby you would release the balance for use in putting up for other Federal reserve notes and expanding the currency if necessary, so that if they can use national bonds you will see how it will relieve the situation. [Applause.]

I regret that anything like politics has passed through this discussion. I have been on that committee for 15 years. I have seen that committee divided in committee on principle, but on politics never. [Applause.] That has never been the history of that committee. The gentleman from Missouri spoke feelingly about the secrecy with which we acted and the order from the White House. The gentleman from Missouri should have been here with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], and myself when the English Government applied to borrow $300,000,000 of our silver. We had a discussion there for a day. Mr. Wilson rung up Mr. CARTER GLASS. Nobody was in favor of it. After we got through a day's wrangling and no one was agreed, a little message came from the White House saying that it was absolutely necessary that that bill should be passed on Monday, suspension day, and that was late Saturday afternoon. Immediately the whole committee turned right in and reported out the bill, and we passed it, and it dealt with one of the major problems of the war, and we did that because the President said it was necessary. That was when President Wilson was in power. Therefore I do not run away from this proposition because the President of the United States, though not of my party at present, is asking that this be done. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH].

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, if the conditions of the country were not as serious as they are, I would be inclined to join in the protest of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS], but everyone who is familiar with what is transpiring knows that we are confronted with very serious—yes, alarming—conditions, and therefore are in honor bound to vote for this measure. I myself have advocated similar legislation ever since December, 1930. Naturally I am not overjoyed with the bill, but I recognize the seriousness of the situation and am going to forego my desire to have my own bill passed and will gladly vote for the bill before us. It is to be regretted that the administration had waited for over a year and two months before sanctioning this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I am wondering whether the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] has not had something to do with the delay, whether the administration has waited for this relief legislation until the wages of the American wage earner were reduced, as they have been in the last few months. I dislike to believe it, but nevertheless it appears that this was the underlying reason, because for over a year the President must have been aware of the serious situation confronting our country.

Notwithstanding that, however, you Republicans and the President have failed and refused to act. I pleaded with the governor of the Federal Reserve Board in December, 1930, and several times since, pointing out to him and to the President the need for such legislation; but, despite my appeals, they have refused to act until this late hour, when they can force this legislation through without giving the membership the time and the opportunity to digest it. [Applause.]

It is rather hard for me to say whether President Hoover had no confidence in the Republican Congress or waited with this legislation these many months so as to secure some political advantage. But the Democratic Congress, having the interest of the people at heart, is indifferent to the political effects it may have. What my party and I are interested in is the passage of this or any other legislation that will be helpful and that will restore confidence. I do not believe in waiting and deliberating while the house is afire. Some of my colleagues charge that this legislation is inflation. I deny it; but if it is, God knows that if ever there was need for a little inflation this is the time.

The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] stated that this country is in an unfortunate condition because of Great Britain's abandonment of the gold standard. In this he is mistaken. The conditions are due to the commercial inflation that had been prevalent from 1925 until 1929, when the crash took place. I concede that Great Britain's abandoning the gold standard did not help matters; but why is it that while in our country hundreds of banks closed; yes, in 1931, over 2,300 closed their doors, in Canada not a single bank failed? I am still of the opinion that if the administration and Federal Reserve Board had acted in 1929 or 1930 or, at least, in 1931 most of these banks and millions of depositors could have been saved.

Some colleagues find fault with the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee [Mr. STEAGALL] because he has not informed the House of evidence submitted by Mr. Charles Dawes, president of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. No doubt the evidence given by him was of such serious nature that the chairman was wise in not making it public. We are trying to reestablish confidence and not destroy the hope of people. Some day, and I hope in the near future, when conditions will right themselves, I feel that not only the chairman of the committee but others will be in a position to inform the Nation and place the responsibility for the present distressing circumstances. I repeat, they could have been minimized if steps had been taken in time.

Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied that no one will charge me with not having tried with all my power to secure action to stave off this panic. On December 12, 1930, not being able to see the President or the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, I sent the latter the following communication:

DECEMBER 12, 1930.

Hon. EUGENE MEYER,
Governor Federal Reserve Board,
Treasury Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MEYER: Without going into the other causes responsible for the present alarming situation, I feel that the terrific stock inflation, and the unloading during the past two years of millions and millions of shares of such inflated, and in many instances, worthless stocks, upon the masses by means of high-power methods, has contributed more than any other cause, and is responsible to a greater degree for the increasingly desperate condition of our country to-day. Such inflation has drained the working capital required for legitimate business and has resulted in a tremendous stagnation of the commerce of the Nation, which in turn has led to nation-wide unemployment, thereby creating not only want and misery but alarming discontent.

I believe that it is within the power of the Federal Reserve Board to accept for rediscount purposes—in addition to notes, drafts, bills of exchange, and Government bonds—the paper of finance corporations. But in addition thereto, because of existing conditions, I feel that the Federal Reserve Board should be authorized to accept for rediscount municipal, public utility, and railroad bonds, as well as real-estate securities—but only under safe and sane regulations—and propose to offer a bill that will grant such additional power.

I feel that you will agree with me when I say that, with the exception of the few extremely large banking institutions, the major portion of our banks are to-day greatly handicapped, and for no other reason than the fact that they have on hand a very large amount of good but unliquid assets. Already this has caused the closing of a dangerously large number of banks and threatens to close an even still greater number.

Since the Federal reserve system was created for the purpose of aiding our business, industry, and agriculture, its powers should be expanded so that it may successfully cope with the situation confronting us to-day.

Although I know you to be familiar with the basic causes of the conditions existent to-day, nevertheless I now take the liberty of submitting to you certain important facts in this matter, derived from careful investigation and survey.

It is a fact that billions upon billions of dollars of worthless stock in 1928 and 1929 were unloaded upon people in every walk of life, who, as I said on the floor of the House in 1929 and again just the other day, were inveigled by the alluring pictures painted by some of our most prominent financiers and industrial leaders. Then came the inevitable crash, and in order to comply with the demands of the banks for additional securities or for a reduction and payment of their loans, these small investors were obliged to heavily withdraw from their business the very capital necessary for the successful conduct of said business. In addition many were unable to meet the demands of the banks, and a large number of these, in order to aid the small business man, have been, and still are, carrying on these very loans, secured by collateral which, though good, can not be disposed of without great loss.

Therefore it is my firm belief that if at least some of such collateral held by these banks could be utilized for rediscount, they would be relieved. This in turn would enable them to extend to our businesses and industries much-needed aid, and business would thus be permitted to resume its uncurtailed activities, which would bring about a resumption of employment.

I well recognize that a few powerful financiers will object to my plan on the ground that it will result in inflation. Yet it must be conceded that expansion will not now be detrimental but, on the contrary, will be very helpful. For example, you know that brokers' loans have been reduced from above $6,000,000,000 to $2,000,000,000, and these loans were on collateral securities not as safe as contemplated in my plan.

That money is plentiful can not be denied. Thus, for example, money can to-day be obtained in New York for gambling purposes at rates as low as 1½ and 2 per cent. Why not make at least some of it available to the smaller borrowers in need of money for legitimate purposes? I am aware that the few powerful financial institutions have in their vaults approximately $7,000,000,000 worth of securities available for rediscount purposes. Our aim, however, should be to give aid to the banks which, through no fault of theirs, are not so happily situated.

Such extension can do no possible harm but may, and in all likelihood will, revive business activities, which will result in employment for at least some of the 7,000,000 men and women now unemployed.

Knowing your splendid record and your ability as a financier and man of vast experience, I have here humbly set forth my plan and do hope to hear from you to obtain your views.

Very sincerely yours,

A. J. SABATH.

And waited nearly three weeks before I received an answer:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, December 29, 1930.

Hon. A. J. SABATH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SABATH: This is the first opportunity I have had to acknowledge your letter of December 12, in which you suggest that paper secured by municipal and railroad bonds, etc., be made eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks. I notice that you interpret the existing law as giving the Federal reserve banks power to discount paper of finance corporations secured by various commodities. This is not in accordance with the law and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board, which do not permit the rediscount of finance paper, with certain minor exceptions specifically provided for in the act, such as the paper of cotton factors. I believe that it may be of service to you to see an article on paper eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks in the bulletin for July, 1930, of which I inclose a copy.

You will notice from this article that of the 8,522 member banks there were 99 that had no eligible paper; 1,749 that had between 0.1 and 10 per cent of their paper eligible for rediscount; 4,813, including 4,427 country banks, that had between 10 and 40 per cent; and 1,861, including 1,806 country banks, that had 40 per cent or over. This indicates that there are very few banks that do not have enough eligible paper to use at the reserve banks when the need arises. I am not inclined to believe, therefore, that enlarging the class of paper eligible for rediscount at the reserve banks would help the credit or the business situation.

Sincerely yours,

EUGENE MEYER, Governor.

Upon the receipt of this letter I realized that there was a determination on the part of the Federal Reserve Board not to act, and, therefore, on January 19, 1931, I again communicated with him, as follows:

JANUARY 19, 1931.

Hon. EUGENE MEYER,
Governor Federal Reserve Board,
Treasury Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: In your reply of December 29, 1930, you say that "with certain minor exceptions specifically provided for in the act, the rediscount of finance paper is not in accordance with the law and the regulations of the Federal Reserve Board," and call my attention to an article in the Federal Reserve Bulletin of July, 1929, containing data on paper eligible for rediscount, which you state may be of service to me.

As per your suggestion, I have read the article and have studied the act and am still of the opinion that it is within the power of the Federal Reserve Board to permit the rediscount of finance corporation paper. Especially do I call to your attention that part of the article, on page 401, referring to the "tests of eligibility," which reads as follows and which, I maintain, sustains my views:

"* * * the Federal reserve act provides in a general way that so-called commercial paper be eligible for discount with the reserve banks. This is a class of paper that a typical member bank would acquire in considerable volume in the course of its ordinary operations, and at the same time one that is so liquid that it can be safely held by the banks of issue. Paper created in the process of financing the flow of commodities in production and trade arises out of loans that are ordinarily liquidated by the borrower with funds received in the natural course of events from the sale of goods underlying the transaction."

The article also properly states that—

"* * * The Federal reserve system was established for the purpose, among others, of creating an agency from which member banks can obtain credit for seasonal or emergency needs."

Does the board maintain that there is no emergency existing at this time? To my mind, if ever there was an emergency it is now, and this, I feel, no one can successfully deny. For while 439 banks closed their doors in 1929, during the year 1930, 934 banks were forced to suspend business.

You further state, "* * * that of the 8,522 member banks there were 99 that had no eligible paper, 1,749 that had between 0.1 and 10 per cent of their paper eligible for rediscount, 4,813 that had between 10 and 40 per cent, and 1,861 that had 40 per cent or over."

And again, I feel justified in asking for, or suggesting, the broadening of the board's regulations so as to make eligible for rediscount, at least for the present, the Finance Corporation paper, since the compilation does disclose that there are 99 banks without any and 1,749 with but from 0.1 to 10 per cent of their paper eligible for rediscount. And since these figures are as of December 31, 1929, I can not help but believe that in view of the prevalent conditions and the continuous drain upon the banks that the amount of rediscountable, eligible paper held by the 8,000 of the approximately 8,320 remaining member banks has been greatly reduced. The seriousness of conditions is evidenced by the unfortunate, ever-increasing number of banks forced to close up due to the fact that they are unable, unless it be at a great sacrifice, to dispose of their slow and frozen paper assets.

I concede that there are any number of large banks in possession of a surplus of rediscountable paper, and consequently not in need of any aid. But these are not the institutions about whose aid or relief I am concerned. I am interested, yes, vitally so, in relieving not only the several thousand banks whose rediscountable paper has been depleted and the thousands upon thousands of their depositors, but also in arresting the ever-increasing number of failures.

Very sincerely yours,

A. J. SABATH.

But received no reply.

But this was not all. I communicated with the President, as I have said before, and was finally referred to the chairman of the seventh Federal reserve district, Mr. Eugene Stevens, to whom I pointed out, and I believe clearly, the need for broadening the power of the Federal Reserve Board. But, notwithstanding all of this, the administration has failed to act until this late date, though I am satisfied that the President realized that this legislation must be forthcoming to save the country from complete demoralization. And now, despite my lack of confidence in the Federal Reserve Board, but realizing as I do the seriousness of conditions, I have no alternative but to vote for the bill as agreed upon. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LAMBETH].

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, once again the Members of this House, after the Grim Reaper has recently laid his heavy hand upon two of our leaders and after the actual or imminent collapse of other valuable men, the remainder of us, with depleted physical and mental reserves after working long hours into the far night, are called upon with the utmost haste and without proper deliberation to consider another measure of the highest importance and of the most revolutionary character in our all-important banking system since the enactment of the Federal reserve system 18 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, I would not worthily represent the people of my beloved and bleeding State, 90 per cent of whom are all but prostrate from the dire results of this cruel depression, and would be essaying the rôle of the priest or Levite if I did not seize any available opportunity to vote for any bill which would offer hope of relief. However, although I wish to be a good soldier, I wish at the same time to give warning here and now that for myself I shall oppose further abdication of the rights and privileges of membership in this body, which is closer to the people and more truly representative of the people than any other branch of the Government, because of the errors of omission and commission of this administration.

I shall not undertake to discuss the technical features of this bill, but merely attempt to explain my attitude toward this whole program of emergency financial legislation and give my reasons for voting in the affirmative this afternoon and also my mental reservations in doing so.

Mr. Speaker, I give this vote my hand and my heart, but not wholly my head. Congress to-day is the doctor summoned to a patient who had for years been doped on false stimulants until he collapsed, and then by way of treatment had been told that there was nothing wrong with him, or that anyhow he would be all right very soon. The Congress should have been called in extra session at least two months ahead of the December date, at a time when the last of the ever-feebler Pollyanna statements were still coming through the White House doors. But the doctor on the case, very jealous even before the Congress had become practically Democratic, refused until the last possible moment to let the real doctor take hold. So the Democratic House is now confronted with months, years, of piled-up dallyings and mistakes. If we must give something like oxygen or salt infusions simply to keep the patient's heart going, it is in no wise our fault.

I submit as a clear fact that the existing panic has proved itself not only worse than any we ever had before but worse, beyond all comparison, than any we ever could have had. In 1836, in 1873, even to a great extent until within the last decade financial smashes and industrial depressions passed over the heads of the vast majority without vital harm. We had not yet become, although we were steadily becoming, a nation of industrial employees and of investors in outside or listed securities. Universal lending, borrowing, and speculating had not yet linked us—and far too many of our banks—tightly to Wall Street. We cared little what the international bankers and the borrowing foreign countries did. Often we stood off and ridiculed "the Wall Street panic" when Wall Street was as wild with fear as it has been of late. If we had had the Federal reserve system then instead of an inelastic currency based rigidly upon United States bonds, we would seldom have cared at all. But, alas, how different now!

Mr. Speaker, during this last ruinous period of shuffling and delay by the administration my own State, among others, was brought crashing down by a financial earthquake. In North Carolina, between October 1, 1931, and January 13, 1932, 11 national banks and 35 State banks, with resources approximating $40,000,000, were compelled to close their doors. Think what this means in human suffering and lost hopes! Nothing like it has occurred even in the European countries wrecked by the late war. And it occurred notwithstanding all the admittedly ample facilities of the Federal reserve system and nearly half the gold of the world.

The Harding-Coolidge-Hoover régime whooped it on, and when disaster came had no resources but commissions, conferences, and false prophecies which only led deeper into the depths of despair. Well did John W. Davis at the Jackson Day dinner last month characterize the Harding administration as the Era of Dark Betrayal, the Coolidge administration as the Era of Smug Complacency, and the Hoover administration as the Era of Wild Dismay.

Happily the character of the American people, the strength of American institutions, and the vastness of American resources are such that even 11 or 12 years of wretched misgovernment can soon be outlived. The most panic-stricken man has by no means "despaired of the Republic." Considering what governmental and business leadership we had before 1929 and the virtual absence of any at all since then, our country has given a fairly creditable account of itself. Communism is actually feared less now than it was before the beginning of the "depression of 1929 and after."

And, Mr. Speaker, I have the utmost faith in my own State of North Carolina. Take the district which I represent, a veritable cross section of the State. It extends from the long-leaf pine and the peach tree, up mountain slopes to the spruce pine and the sugar maple. It is chiefly agricultural, comprising highly productive belts of truck and fruit crops, cotton, tobacco, wheat, and cattle; and here are a full variety of those manufactures for which the Piedmont section of the South has become famous. Its people are completely typical Americans of the old stock, representing English, Scotch, Scotch-Irish and German. They have fought in Indian wars, in the Revolutionary War, on historic battlefields without number from Kings Mountain to Chateau-Thierry. They are a most self-reliant people. In the present crisis they do not doubt that they could save themselves, as they saved themselves even with the Federal Government against them during the "tragic era" of reconstruction. But they feel that the National Government is in duty bound to help repair the worst mistakes of its disastrously false leadership under the last three administrations. They feel that many evil business practices which have sprung up or grown rankly worse during these orgies of booming and crashing demand reform. And on both scores I stand with them absolutely. I shall spare no effort of mind or body in fighting for really helpful administration of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and of the Federal reserve system's temporary expansion through the Glass-Steagall bill.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, when such people as these, who deserve of their Government as they deserve, have undergone such sufferings, let us all do whatever we can lest the new relief measures as administered be yet again merely measures—

> That keep the word of promise to our ear
> And break it to our hope.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the administration is begging us to vote in a mad rush a more tremendous use of Government resources for business than has ever been even suggested before. Let me say that in voting for this measure with one hand I shall hold myself ready to smite it with the other. I shall smite it if it is not so administered as to help, most of all, small business men, "country banks," and farmers with whose needs I am intimately acquainted, but leaves them in their present wretched plight of being tied to the chariot wheels of Wall Street.

As "things never yet created things," so laws do not administer themselves. And when I read this morning the names of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's advisory committee for the Richmond agency, which includes my State, I was filled with fear of a heart-breaking disappointment in store, for those gentlemen—fine men, able bankers, and some of them good, personal friends of mine—are all wedded to the Wall Street conception of banking as a matter of liquidity and security, and almost nothing else. They make a fetish of liquidity. How will they help suffering people who have already been liquidated until they can see no light ahead? They conceive of securities as consisting in the paper Wall Street handles, or in its kind. How shall they help to disentangle the local bank from Wall Street and again make it useful to the local man?

Mr. Speaker, if one of the three gentlemen appointed from my State to the Richmond agency's advisory committee had been a banker representing the Wall Street point of view, I would not have objected but would have approved. The Wall Street point of view should be represented. But when all three appointees are wholly of this type, I do object. Why were we given no one to represent understandingly and sympathetically the grievous problems of the local or "country bank" and its people? Why none of the many capable small-town bankers along with some good farmer who was also a good business man?

In this connection I would call attention to the fact that although the Reconstruction Finance Corporation started functioning a week ago and has already loaned large sums of money to city banks, railroads, and life-insurance companies, there is still no succor for the small farmers of my State who are on the eve of spring planting, and the Department of Agriculture advises to-day that even the application blanks will not be ready for another week. God help these little men and their hungry families who come last in the thoughts of the administration of this emergency financial legislation. One hundred letters on my desk this morning inquire how to apply for seed loans.

O Mr. Speaker, it is hard to be voting for this bill when a Wall Street administration will have the handling of its provisions through men after the administration's own heart. No wonder the White House is urging frantic speed.

I certainly would not cast this vote but for a however halting hope that the Federal Reserve Board will make some good use of the system as established by Democratic legislation in 1914 after many years of Republican refusal to provide any such instrumentality other than worthless makeshifts while attempting to foist upon the country a central bank.

Mr. Speaker, I have already implied that I do not attack Wall Street or New York banking methods as such. They are well enough adapted within limits to the functions which Wall Street serves through its banks, Stock Exchange houses, and similar institutions for the country at large. But mark the word "limits" and then mark the further reservation that in their admiration for Big Finance and Big Business, often in their positive reverence for these things, some bankers as far from New York as North Carolina or farther apply Wall Street methods to their own banking business and produce a serious misfit. They very largely exclude from the use of their facilities that decided majority of their worthy neighbors who can not offer as collateral securities bearing the Wall Street stamp or essentially of the Wall Street type. At a time like the present, when securities having a Wall Street market appeal to them more than ever in their rabid zeal for liquidity, they almost entirely cease serving the business needs of their local communities—business needs more acute than ever before.

Again I say, Mr. Speaker, that the administration of financial relief in the present situation should not be placed wholly with such bankers as these.

Let me emphasize, too, that while those maintaining a severe attitude toward their own people—really much more severe than Wall Street's because of the scarcer Wall Street collateral away from New York—fall far short of the example set by their idols where human relations are concerned, the best Wall Street men have often put aside even the most ordinary rules of loaning for those whom they personally knew and trusted. Besides telling the Pujo Money Trust investigating committee that he never charged anybody over 6 per cent, the late J. P. Morgan (the First) set forth character as the basis of credit with him. He had loaned as much as a million dollars to a man without security or wealth or wealthy backing, because he felt confidence in that man. On the other hand, he said further that he would not knowingly have dealings with crooks offering all the collateral in the world.

How little necessary it is to be a Shylock in order to be a banker, and even the very biggest sort of banker! Mr.

Speaker, I have here a recent issue of the Chapel Hill Weekly with a statement on the University of North Carolina loans to students which eloquently supports the principle enunciated by Mr. Morgan. The oldest fund now stands at more than six times the original amount after 50 years. All student-loan funds at present aggregate $212,700, of which borrowers have contributed over $115,000 through interest payments. Of $182,700 now outstanding in student notes, the university auditor estimates the total uncollected at 1 per cent or under. The Chapel Hill paper notes that the Harmon Foundation in New York has had a similar experience with student loans made throughout the country and that commercial credit agencies estimate the delinquency rate in the small-loan business at only 2 per cent. Meanwhile, "securities" chosen by college trustees in preference to student loans as an investment for endowment funds have undergone frightful shrinkage.

I earnestly commend this financial creed of Mr. Morgan, likewise his well-remembered displays of confidence in the country when times were tight, to bankers who plume themselves above everything upon being "Wall Street men" or the best imitation of "Wall Street man" they can contrive, and who from lordly heights of scorn denounce as demagoguery any criticism of even the worst or most injurious of Wall Street practices. I commend them to every one of the bankers in that financial army holding nearly $3,000,000,000 of eligible commercial paper which they will not rediscount and in a position to make $4,000,000,000 of additional loans which they will not make—these figures on the authority of officials of the Federal Reserve Board. It is thoroughly recognized that if bankers had not first become frightened, neither the Reconstruction Finance Corporation nor the Glass-Steagall bill would be needed to hearten timid bankers through making available still other paper headed by United States bonds. The Federal reserve system was already offering abundant facilities; those facilities simply were not being used.

Mr. Speaker, let me offer for the highest admiration of the worshippers of "liquidity" a bank recently opened in Miami, Fla. This "ideal" bank will hold only cash and Government securities, loan no money, and pay no interest on deposits. It will be "safe"—as safe from all natural shocks as a man in his grave, and for the same reason.

How could depositors be otherwise than frightened or subject to fright while they have seen more and more bankers doing such fantastic things? When the timid bankers started a stampede for liquidity they carried panic into a thousand quarters—including many innocent victims among banks—where it would not otherwise have gone. More average liquidity called competitively for more average liquidity still until the business of the country was threatened with stoppage unless a degree of confidence was somehow restored. Hence the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the present bill.

Another thing, Mr. Speaker. We shall hear very little for some time of Republican prosperity or how the oracles of Mammon are permanently committed to Republican hands. Nor shall we hear much of the all-wise and all-powerful big-business men who were the secular gods of the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover period. But I hope that we shall hear a good deal of the wickedness among so-called "business leaders," which has brought deadly loss and fear upon our people far beyond what they would otherwise have suffered. I believe safeguards against at least the wholesale continuation of such wickedness to be absolutely necessary for new courage and new prosperity in the years ahead.

Think of Lord Kylsant, a lord of Parliament, a peer of the realm, put into stripes for a year by English courts because he made one false statement in one report to the stockholders of his corporation. And then think of such things as the Continental Trading Co., the Whelan connection with the United Cigar Stores Corporation, the attempted casting out the creditors of the Fisk Rubber Co., also the ruinous history of the Goldman Sachs, Blue Ridge, Shenandoah and other interlocking investment trusts. Nor can we soon forget the havoc wrought by crooked mortgage bankers, like the F. H. Smith Co., in the lives of deserving people, without number, whose savings have been swept away. John D. Rockefeller, jr., exemplified the highest type of business ethics and leadership when he made the fight to secure voting proxies to force the resignation of Col. Robert W. Stewart, chairman of the board of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, one of the principals in the Continental Trading Co.

The reports of some corporations whose securities are listed on the New York Stock Exchange are full of suppressions and misleading information and are not regulated sufficiently to protect the interest of the public. In some cases these corporations are required to submit a meager balance sheet to their stockholders only once a year.

I believe that business graft has been outweighing political graft a hundred times over, that our so-called "business leaders" are as a class serving us far less conscientiously than our political leaders, and that there must be a new spirit in our business world.

Mr. Speaker, in all matters it will help mightily when next we have an administration sufficiently unlike this:

> The king is scared,
> The kingdom topples over with a shriek,
> Like an old woman, and down rolls the world.

Yes, Mr. Speaker; we need brave hearts and a firm grasp at the helm of affairs. We may not hope for a Joseph who could foresee seven fat years followed by seven lean. But we may hope for some one like Paul, who could hearten all aboard ship when "the tempestuous wind called Euroclydon" was driving the sailors to desert in boats. We may hope for such a trumpet note as William Pitt sounded in 1805 during the Napoleonic wars, when he prophesied that "England, having saved herself by her energy, would save Europe by her example." Meantime we must look a little enviously upon the stirring spectacle presented last September, when Philip Snowden, life-long invalid, giving up his whole political existence for his country's sake, underwent physical and mental torture to rally England with his last budget speech.

But remembering how God gave us Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, we can not doubt that long before it is too late He will send us the man we need.

For the mass of us, Mr. Speaker, I would have that spirit which Rome showed when Hannibal was encamped at the gates of the city, after cutting in pieces three Roman armies and there was no Roman army left to encounter him. Historians tell us that the field then occupied by his troops, coming up for sale at auction in regular course, brought the full price.

God save us from any recurrence of the so-called prosperity of 1927–1929. It was a lopsided and crazy boom because in 1928 the farmer, representing at least 25 per cent of the entire population, received less than 10 per cent of the national income, while in 1929, 504 millionaires reported a total income of over $1,000,000,000, which sum represented a figure in excess of the gross selling price of all the wheat and cotton produced in 1930.

I hope and believe that better times will come out of this panic when and where we hardly expect, "like a thief in the night." Good as well as bad times can not always be foreseen exactly—

> For not by eastern windows only
> When daylight comes, comes in the light.
> In front the sun climbs slow, how slowly;
> But westward look—the land is bright!

[Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield my remaining two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DISNEY].

Mr. DISNEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill, in my judgment, is one of the means by which this depression can be ended, a thing we are all trying to see come about. Many palliatives and remedies have been suggested, but as long as we are going to rely upon the Federal reserve system and the gold standard this is our only way out. Personally, I believe that there are several features of our banking laws that ought to be remedied in addition to the bill now under consideration; but, of course, at the present time we are simply considering this one.

Among the palliatives that have been brought forth was the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which most of its proponents in the House made excuses for and heartily disliked voting for, but did it for fear of results that might happen if it were not passed. No one contended then, and no one will insist now, that it is either a permanent or a sufficient remedy. It was simply a case of giving the Treasury a broom with which to sweep back the Atlantic Ocean.

We who have been interested in the currency legislation have contended during the whole session that an expansion of the currency was the only sound and practical way to relieve the distressed condition of business and the banks, and consequently the individuals. You will remember that in 1921 President Harding announced for a deflation of the currency in certain specific language, saying that "We must have courageous deflation of the currency in order to bring down the cost of living." Currency was deflated from approximately eight billions in volume in 1921 under President Harding to a little over four billions in January, 1931, and the consequent contraction of the currency and business in the United States and all over the world. I believe that Congress should do away with the power on the part of any board or commission to expand or deflate the currency at will to any appreciable degree, but that must be done by special act of Congress and this is not the time for its presentation.

The evil of hoarding has not been indulged in by individuals alone, and a campaign against hoarding can not be successfully conducted by persuasion or force. Sound business reasons and the restoration of confidence are the only means of freeing hoarded money. Hoarding is based upon fear and selfishness, and these must be overcome by their opposites, confidence and profit possible on the part of the individual or the institution. It has been developed during the hearings that the worst hoarders have been the banks themselves, particularly the big New York banks.

Fright upon the part of the smaller banks has shot their money into New York for safe-keeping, and tremendous quantities of money are there for that purpose. Every bank desires to remain liquid so as to pay upon demand, just as the individual wants to stay liquid in order to have money for his debts upon demand. This money will not circulate again until the business institutions and the individuals feel that they can procure money again if they spend what they have.

It appears that our Federal reserve notes are backed by an 80 per cent gold reserve, but the law required only 40 per cent, so we have the surplus 40 per cent of gold as dormant value, doing no one any good. In amount it is between three-quarters of a billion and a billion dollars. Freed, it can be used for the issuance of at least $2,000,000,000 of Federal reserve notes or paper money, to be placed immediately in circulation in current business or in an emergency. This gold can be freed by this legislation. In addition to the possibility of its being used as a basis for Federal reserve notes, the release of a billion dollars in gold means the release of fifteen or sixteen times that much in banking and business credits, for it is a matter of banking history that that is the ratio, say 15 to 20. With the expansion of the currency to the extent of $2,000,000,000, coupled with the release of fifteen to twenty billion dollars in business credits, business can not remain dormant, because this Nation has the value but is only lacking in credits and circulating medium. The value consists of real estate, cotton, wheat, corn, oats, livestock, and so forth.

These constitute the actual wealth and the money and the credits—the representative of this wealth and value. There is no use to have the wealth without its representative in money, and we can not have the money representative unless we have the wealth. This plan of currency and credit expansion was proposed in 1908 by Senator Robert L. Owen, of Oklahoma, one of the authors of the Federal reserve act, and has been constantly suggested by him as a means of relief during the last two years. In fact, Mr. Speaker, the history of this legislation goes back still further. Senator JONES in 1900 suggested the same proposal, and Senator Owen, then a private citizen, assisted him in drawing the measure.

This bill meets the widespread demand for liberalization of the credit and currency, a demand that has grown day by day among Members of Congress, and all of the authorities on business and banking are confident that this credit expansion will see a return of business and prosperity to the Nation. Immediately upon the proposal of this legislation by Senator GLASS we noticed that the stock market began to move up, and on Saturday of last week it showed renewed confidence. This is only one of the indexes as to public thinking and is simply a reflection of the confidence of the individuals and the units of our business fabric.

For one, I am unalterably committed to this legislation, although I opposed the reconstruction finance measure. This is sound and safe, constructive, and meets the present need. The pity is that it was not brought forth a year ago. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY].

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to section 3 of the bill, which provides that the Federal reserve banks may receive Treasury notes, that is, Federal reserve notes, from Federal reserve agents on the deposit of direct obligations of the United States as security. There is nothing new about this provision. Great Britain incorporated it in its laws. It is the same principle introduced by a Democratic Senator from Oklahoma, the Hon. Robert L. Owen, on February 25, 1908 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 2429). It is the same principle as the bill introduced by Hon. James K. Jones when he was chairman of the Democratic National Committee and Democratic leader of the Senate on February 6, 1900 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1534). This is an identical provision in principle with that set forth in the bill H. R. 6704, by Hon. KENT E. KELLER, of Illinois, on January 4, 1932. Congressman KELLER is a Democrat.

The only substantial difference between the section 3 and the bill introduced by Congressman KELLER is that the Keller bill dealt with the matter without red tape and authorized the Treasury notes to be issued direct to any bank, corporation, or individual up to 90 per cent of the face value of the bonds an interest charge of 5 per cent, payable to the Treasury; and a forfeiture of 10 per cent if the currency was not returned within 12 months. The Keller bill offers to the public a wider and better distributed relief. The pending bill, however, should operate advantageously, because it does make available the possible deposit credit of four billions, or a currency issue of thirty-five hundred millions, since there is available a possible fourteen hundred millions in gold estimated. and the gold could be increased in the reserve banks by exchanging reserve notes for gold certificates, of which there is circulating approximately $1,000,000,000. As these pass over the counters they could be exchanged for Federal reserve notes, thus adding to the gold holdings of the reserve banks

It has taken a long time for this venerable Democratic doctrine to become statute law. The country does not want to lose sight of the fact that leading Democrats have been advocating this for at least 32 years and that it was rejected by Senator Aldrich February 6, 1900. February 25, 1908, and up to this good date. The country can now be congratulated for this Democratic doctrine becoming effective. It took a terrifying depression to twist this concession out of the Republicans.

Perhaps the exigency of the pending campaign and the absolute necessity for getting some reaction may have facilitated the consent of the administration. It is certain that during the last month administration leaders have expressed their vigorous disapproval of bond-secured currency and, having sworn they never would consent, consented.

STATE, JUSTICE, AND JUDICIARY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Union Calendar and ordered printed.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order.

IMPROVEMENTS OF FACILITIES OF FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALLGOOD].

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Speaker, there is no question in the world about the panic being on in this country and that the people now want it settled. They want it stopped. They are looking to this Congress to stop it. They are not expecting miracles to be performed, for they know it will take time to work out of this desperate situation. They are not even expecting the passage of one bill to cure all the ills of this country, but I do feel that they are looking to Congress for relief and I know that they are glad that we are not playing politics in the passage of these bills. If anyone wishes to call this bill a partisan measure, we Democrats can certainly claim credit for its enactment because it is the product of two sterling Democrats—Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia, former Secretary of the Treasury in Woodrow Wilson's administration, and Representative HENRY B. STEAGALL, of Alabama, now chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House. I am happy to see the spirit of cooperation on the part of the Democrats of this House. If the Republicans had shown the same spirit of cooperation when they were in control, they would not have run roughshod over us in the enactment of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which law has contributed greatly to the bringing on of this the greatest depression in the history of this Nation. It is my opinion that the country is now waiting for the Democratic Party to come into power to repeal the Smoot-Hawley tariff law.

Mr. Speaker, just as long as conditions are such that individuals fail and can not pay their debts, just that long will merchants and banks continue to fail. This country is no stronger than the individual. Therefore we must pass laws to protect the individual, whether he lives on the farm or works in the shops, factories, stores, business houses, offices, professions, and varied industries of our country. We need legislation that will make it possible for the individual, however humble he may be, to make an honest living and pay his debts. Therefore we are asking for the passage of this law so as to break the corner on the money market which has been held by the millionaires since 1929. This law will expand our currency and place more money in circulation, which will deflate the value of the dollar of the rich man and inflate the value of farm products and wages of the laboring man.

I am glad I supported the bill creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which became a law two weeks ago. Gentlemen, we can already see the good effects of that bill. Bank failures are occurring less frequently, the stock market has taken an upward trend, cotton has advanced considerably, industry has revived. In my district the bonds of one major industry, the Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., have made a material advance since the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. This advance may mean that 2,000 men at this plant alone may continue to hold their jobs and have work, because confidence has been and is being established in industry. It is generally believed by the Democrats that had the Republicans at the extra session of Congress called by Mr. Hoover enacted legislation similar to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and passed legislation similar to this bill, we would not have had the widespread unemployment of labor coupled with the multiplied bank and business failures with the resultant ruinous prices of farm products. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, ladies, and gentlemen, we are to-day considering H. R. 9203, a bill to liberalize the credit facilities of the Federal reserve system.

In this connection I wish to call attention to the fact that on September 24, 1931, the Hon. F. B. SWANK, of Oklahoma, and I personally submitted to the President a constructive program to relieve the acute situation which was aggravating every day. About the middle of September it became apparent that currency was being withdrawn from banks for hoarding purposes, while at the same time the losses in deposits due to gold exports was increasing. It became apparent to many that the process of contraction of credits would soon result in a severe crisis if not checked. This process of contraction increased so rapidly that it became apparent that many banks would be forced to close their doors with resulting losses of the greatest magnitude.

I felt then as I feel now, that the only way of procuring relief would be to raise the price levels of farm commodities. The farmer finds himself in a most serious condition. In 1929, when wheat was selling for $1 per bushel and when cotton was bringing 16 cents, he executed mortgages on his land and contracted fixed indebtedness. When he made these debts the price of commodities was sufficient to afford reasonable expectation of his ability to discharge the obligations when due. But to-day he is called upon to apply upon his indebtedness three or four times the amount of commodities he would have had to pay at the time the debts were contracted. In other words, the wheat farmer who borrowed $5,000 understood that he would be required to discharge this obligation to his creditor by the delivery of 5,000 bushels of wheat. But to-day, due to the depressed price of wheat and the sustained value of the dollar, he is required to deliver 10,000 bushels of wheat to discharge his obligation. This he can not do.

Not only is this true in reference to the farmer, but it is true in reference to a large portion of the debtor classes. The gross indebtedness of Federal, State, and local governments is now around $32,000,000,000. When you add to this the private indebtedness of the people of the United States, the total indebtedness runs into many billions of dollars. To discharge these staggering obligations will require many of the debtor classes to deliver from three to five times the amount of commodities that would have been required at the time the indebtedness was contracted. The fall in commodity prices has tremendously increased the value of money, with the consequence that a given quantity of money will exchange for a larger quantity than before of other things.

It is therefore obvious that the price of farm commodities must rise in proportion to the value of money, so that the debtor can pay off his creditor with the same quantity of commodities as was contemplated at the time of the creation of the debt. If the debtor is required to deliver three or four times as much commodity in the payment of his debts, he will in many instances be wiped out, and his property will go to his creditors. If the creditors insist upon the full pound of flesh, they in turn will find themselves in virtual bankruptcy with frozen assets that they can not dispose of.

Not only is it necessary for the price of farm commodities to rise so that the debtor can pay off his fixed obligations incurred in the past but also in order that the debtor may exchange his commodities for the things that he must purchase. The price of many commodities which the farmer is required to purchase, such as farm implements, clothing, and so forth, has declined very little in comparison with the tremendous fall in the price of farm commodities. Consequently, the farmer, in order to exchange his surplus products for the things that he requires, must give such a large quantity that he is operating below the cost of production. Now, it is obvious that if the prices of farm commodities are to remain at their present level the prices of all other commodities must decline in proportion.

In September, when we presented our program to the President, I realized that unless the price of farm commodities was materially increased and put upon an equal plane or level with that of other commodities we would eventually be confronted with drastic legislation having for its purpose the inflation of the currency so that the value of the dollar would decrease in proportion to the fall in commodity prices, and that the Federal Government would be called upon to appropriate vast sums out of the Public Treasury for the purpose of feeding the hungry and clothing the needy.

The only way that the price level of farm commodities can be raised is to give the farmer the same bargaining power in the sale of his surplus commodities and in the purchase of the things that he requires as is possessed by the industrial, commercial, and financial institutions of this Nation and to increase the purchasing power of the American consumers. I have heretofore shown in speeches delivered on the floor of the House that many industrial, financial, and business concerns have freed themselves from foreign competition by the protective tariff, and from domestic competition by mergers, combinations, cooperative agreements, and so forth, so that they are in a position to largely dictate the price that they will pay for their raw material and the price which they will charge for their finished product. I have shown that the economic groups to whom the farmer is compelled to sell his surplus products and from whom he is compelled to purchase the necessities that he requires are able to dictate the prices and that the farmer has no bargaining power whatsoever. I have also shown that in order to give the farmer the same bargaining power as that possessed by the privileged and favored classes we must either compel these classes to sell their products on a competitive basis the same as the farmer or we must permit the farmer, through governmental aid, to control the prices of his products and services.

In other words, we must either raise the bargaining power of the farmer, the laborer, and the independent merchant, or we must lower the bargaining power of the privileged and favored classes. The purpose of the Sherman antitrust law was to put all classes and economic groups upon the same competitive basis and to give no one class any more bargaining power than the other classes. I have heretofore shown that this law has not been enforced and that the Government has permitted the privileged and favored classes, in violation of the law, to fix the prices of their output and to control the market.

But the restoration of true competition among all economic groups and the effort to put farming upon the same plane of economic equality as that enjoyed by other classes is a long fight and can not be accomplished in time to afford immediate relief. It is also true that speculation, sale of watered stock, foreign and domestic, and the efforts during the past decade or two to suspend or interfere with, in so far as certain favored groups and industries are concerned, the natural and orderly operation of economic laws have tremendously impaired the purchasing power of the consumers. When the unsound structure created by speculation crumbled, it accelerated the process of contraction until the purchasing power of labor was reduced between fifteen and twenty billions of dollars. Since labor consumed a large part of farm commodities, this meant that the farmer had lost demand for his surplus.

The only way to remedy this condition is to restore the purchasing power of labor. This can only be done by giving the 8,000,000 unemployed people jobs. The only direct manner in which the Government can create jobs is to inaugurate a construction and improvement program in every part of the Nation. Therefore, on September 24, I urged the President to inaugurate immediately needed public improvements and construction by appropriating the necessary sums for road work, Federal buildings, waterway improvements, and so forth. It has been demonstrated that 85 per cent of the money spent for road improvements goes to labor. A large percentage of the money spent for Federal buildings also goes to labor. The material which must be purchased from private industries would enable these industries to give employment to our people. It could not have been urged that this money would have been squandered. We are in need of many Federal buildings, and, in fact, are paying excessive rents in a number of large cities. In my own district there are many towns where post-office buildings are urgently needed, such as, for example, Lufkin, Rusk, Hemphill, Jasper, San Augustine, Center, Timpson, and other towns that I need not mention.

In January, 1931, I made a trip to Washington at my own expense, and before I took my seat as Congressman of the second district, for the purpose of urging the Post Office Department to construct Federal buildings in Beaumont, Lufkin, Rusk, and other towns in my district. Senator CONNALLY and I conferred with Major Heath, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury. It was decided to erect a new building at Beaumont, and to allocate a large sum for the erection of a post office at Lufkin. Although the construction of the post-office building at Beaumont has been unnecessarily delayed, it will furnish employment to many people of that city and will do much to relieve unemployment there and put money in circulation. Many waterways, such as the Sabine-Neches waterway, urgently need deepening and widening and other improvements. Already one-fourth of the tonnage in the United States moves over the Sabine-Neches waterways. The development of these waterways is responsible for the location of many great refineries in Jefferson County that furnish employment to thousands of people and create a market for the farm products of southeast Texas. Not only is this true but the development of waterways such as the Sabine-Neches has materially reduced the freight rates for the transportation of cotton. This has meant a tremendous saving to the farmers, and therefore the people of the interior are vitally interested in this subject.

The development of an adequate road system throughout the United States is important to every class of our citizenship. Motor transportation of passengers and freight has increased so tremendously and become such an important factor in our economic and social life that good roads have become a necessity. They enable the farmer to transport his products at a cheaper cost. Therefore such a public improvement program as the one I urged upon the President would not only have created employment, arrested the progress of ruinous deflation, caused the wheels of industry to begin to move, and increased the circulation of currency but it would also have resulted in lasting benefit to the Nation from a purely monetary point of view. At any rate, such a program would not have resulted in the extension of Federal aid solely to the financiers and investment companies but would have started at the bottom and increased the purchasing power of the masses, which would have meant the easing of the financial tension that is paralyzing industry. The failure of the President to sponsor such a program may compel us to face the far-reaching issue of direct Federal aid and other types of legislation, which everyone admits should be esorted to only as the last extremity.

Since Congress convened it has authorized the expenditures and sale of bonds guaranteed by the United States Government in excess of $2,500,000,000, and I believe that if this money had been devoted to needed public improvements such as I have outlined the masses of the people would have received considerably more benefit and that it would have hastened the return of normal conditions. As an alternative for emergency legislation, it would have been wiser for the Government to have inaugurated a vigorous improvement program that would have created immediate employment and provided for a wholesome inflation that could have been restrained within reasonable bounds.

I also urged the President to advocate the regulation of our banking system. I stated to him that it was difficult to believe that any country as rich as ours and in the midst of plenty would be embarrassed as we are and faced with distress and unemployment if we had a well-balanced banking system. The actual wealth of the Nation, which consists of land, machinery, farm commodities, and so forth, is still here. The trouble is that the exchange of commodities and services has been paralyzed, and consequently we have the ridiculous spectacle of surplus on the one hand and want on the other. The banking machinery has broken down and consequently credit has been paralyzed. Credit is an important factor in our economic life. It facilitates the transfer of capital and the use of materials of production. Credit plays an important part in our everyday business transactions. Less than 10 per cent of ordinary business transactions are settled by hand money.

Of the fifty billions in bank deposits throughout the Nation, only about 10 per cent is represented in outstanding currency. Credit has built up 90 per cent of the bank deposits. When the banking system fails to permit the huge volume of business and the interchange of goods to flow freely through bookkeeping transactions, then it is not functioning properly. Of course, credit can be abused, as was the case for several years prior to the stock-market crash in 1929, when credit was diverted from commercial uses to speculative purposes. The Federal Reserve Board was responsible for this abuse by its failure to take the necessary precautions during the latter part of 1927 to curb the excessive credit demands of speculative users. Although sufficient warning was given to the country during the latter part of 1927, the Federal Reserve Board failed to take adequate measures to curb the unparalleled speculation. This was in part due to the approaching elections of 1928, and the administration wanted to continue the artificial prosperity as long as possible. But in spite of this, credit is absolutely necessary under our economic system. It is apparent that credit has shrunk to such a point that the value of the dollar has continually risen and the price of many commodities has fallen until the whole structure of business and finance is threatening to crumble. Had the President called Congress in session in September and taken vigorous steps to stop the tremendous deflation, hundreds of bank failures could have been prevented and much loss and suffering avoided.

If we permit the use of Government bonds as a basis for currency, we can release $750,000,000 in gold. This will relieve the severe credit tension and give full opportunity to the banks to extend sufficient credit to every class in our economic life. But the liberalization of our credit and currency will not result in real benefit unless those in charge of the administration of the reserve system will use sound judgment and will not be influenced by political considerations. If the reserve system permits credit to be injudiciously extended to securities so as to inflate unreasonably the market quotations of stocks, bonds, and other securities, we will have another stock-market crash which will be much more severe and disastrous in the general effects upon the country. I do not mean by this that we should not improve the securities market, because this is one of the principal forces of revival. In a gold-standard country such as ours there must be a limit, fixed by reserve requirements, to the extent to which the credit volume may contract. The contraction of credit has proceeded so far as to become positively dangerous. But in order to discourage excessive use of credit, to prevent speculation and unsound inflation, it might be advisable to impose a penalty discount rate upon member banks whose portfolios contain any large amount of street loans.

Security operations are likely to develop inflationary dangers, and there must be some special curbing measures to prevent such inflation. We must see that less credit is extended to speculators and more credit is given to honest producers. But in the final analysis everything depends upon the wisdom of the administrators of the Federal reserve system. No matter how perfect a law may be, if it is administered by foolish or selfish men, it will result in disaster to the people. Every sound thinker now agrees that the stock-market crash was due to the fact that money was too cheap at the end of 1927. From July to December, 1927, the reserve system's holding of bills and securities increased from $976,000,000 to $1,591,000,000. Brokers' loans and street loans increased tremendously, but in spite of this fact Mr. Mellon, on March 27, 1927, said that "brokers' loans give a very good insight into the stock-market situation, and they appear in a very healthy state." He also said on the same date:

I see nothing to indicate that business will not continue to be good throughout the country. There is an abundant supply of easy money which should take care of any contingencies that might arise. I do not look for any change in the Federal reserve rediscount rate for some time to come because I can see no reason for changing.

When we examine the figures of the total loans and investments of all member banks, we find that during the last five months of 1927 the total expansion was at an annual rate of 10.8 per cent. It was apparent in 1927 and the first part of 1928 that the fall money market of 1927 had been made unnecessarily easy. The index of industrial production had shown that since the first quarter of 1927 and for the last six months of 1927 such production declined to 103, as compared to 109 for the first half of the year. The growth in member-bank credits in the second half of the year 1927 was almost entirely attributable to investments and loans on investments. From August 3 until December 28, 1927, the reporting member banks increased their total loans and investments by $1,364,000,000. Only 7 per cent of this increase was due to the supposed grouping of "other loans." The total brokers' borrowings reported by members of the stock exchange increased from June 30 to December 31, 1927, by $864,000,000, or 24 per cent. Before the summer rate reductions, on June 30, 1927, for instance, the total of brokers' borrowings was not much larger than at the beginning of 1926. The stock prices continued their rapid upward movement. The industrial production was not increasing, but the prices of stocks was rapidly increasing, due to the artificial influence of cheap money.

In 1928 total loans and investments of reporting member banks increased $570,000,000 from January to July, and over one-half of this growth in member-bank credit was in investments and loans on securities. From December 31, 1927, to June 30, 1928, the reserve banks did not successfully resist the growing demands for bank credit by the security market.

From 1922 to 1929 corporations were rapidly increasing their stock issues and taking advantage of the public's appetite for stocks. The following table shows the enormous extent to which in 1928 and 1929 stock issues increased. In 1922 the monthly average of stock issues was $51,999. In 1923, $61,330; in 1924, $72,191; in 1925, $109,248; in 1926, $109,814; in 1927, $146,573; in 1928, $297,998; in 1929, $572,132.

Therefore, it is apparent that corporations were rapidly increasing their stock issues. The reasons for this are apparent. From 1919 to 1929 they were permitted to merge with the tacit consent of the administration, which made no effort to enforce the Sherman antitrust law. Many mergers were formed because promoters saw the opportunity to make a fortune through overcapitalization through the issuance and sale of watered stock. In my speech delivered in the House of Representatives on December 17, 1931, I showed that Professor Dewing, who examined in detail the promotion and financial history of 14 of the largest American combines, concluded that in their promotion the total tangible assets averaged 40 per cent of the total issued securities; the remaining 60 per cent represented watered stocks. From 1919 to December 10, 1930, 8,003 manufacturing and mining establishments disappeared through the process of merger, leaving over 1,267 resulting combinations.

Every time a merger was formed a large block of stock issues was turned loose upon the securities market. In 1929 1,245 concerns were merged or acquired. The monthly average of stock issues for that year was 572,132. The increase of mergers from 1919 to 1929 bears a close relationship to the increase of stock issues during those years. The number of mergers increased steadily from 1919 to 1929. In 1919, 438 concerns disappeared in merger, and in 1929, 1,245 disappeared through this process. As mergers increased, stock issues multiplied until finally the market was saturated with watered stock. The administration permitted this in the following ways: First, by not curbing mergers through the strict enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law; second, by not curbing the speculative use of credit that permitted the inflation of this watered stock by adopting adequate curbing measures beginning with the middle of 1927. The administration encouraged these mergers by its failure to enforce the Sherman antitrust law and its failure to prevent the sale of increasing issues of watered stock, foreign and domestic.

The stock-market crash of 1929 was not the sole cause of the present panic, but it was an important contributing cause. The wholesale collapse, by a variety of processes, was communicated to industry and commerce.

Therefore everything depends upon the administration in power. The Republican administration during the past decade has made many serious blunders and can not escape responsibility for the present crisis. Had it prevented unsound and unjustifiable mergers the market would not have been glutted with watered stock. Had it not encouraged speculation in watered stock and worthless foreign bonds by providing cheap money for such purposes through the short-sighted policy of the Federal Reserve Board, we would not have had the market collapse of 1929. This collapse resulted in tremendous losses to innocent people who had not speculated but who are compelled to pay the price along with those who did speculate. Labor did not speculate on the stock market with the cheap money provided by the Federal reserve system, but it has already sustained losses to the extent of $20,000,000,000. Agriculture did not speculate with the cheap money provided by the Federal reserve system, but it has been compelled to suffer a loss which is so enormous and staggering as to be incapable of any accurate computation.

Therefore it is apparent that our banking system needs to be regulated so as to lessen the chances of another speculative frenzy; but after we have taken every possible precaution the matter still rests in the hands of the administrators of the act. We may provide by law for a guiding principle to serve at least as a point of departure. We must give the system some broad basis of policy, but in the final analysis we must leave much to the judgment, the honesty, the patriotism, and the unselfishness of those in charge of the administration of the system.

But in the meantime we must ease the credit tension. Our gold reserves will safely permit an expansion of $3,500,000,000 in reserve-bank credit before reducing the reserve percentage below the legal amount. Such expansion would increase the loanable funds of the member banks by as much as $35,000,000,000.

By expanding credit we can provide a wholesome inflation that will enable the debtor classes to pay their fixed obligations without having to deliver three or four times more commodities than when the debts were contracted. We may be able to reestablish the free flow of credit, and if we can not start the wheels of industry immediately, we can at least keep thousands of people from losing their equities by providing sufficient credit to tide them over during this unparalleled crisis. But we must keep this inflationary process within reasonable bounds and under firm control. If unsound inflation is encouraged during the six months preceding the next election, as it was during the six months preceding the 1928 election, although we may bring about an artificial prosperity, we will only invite another economic collapse more serious and far-reaching than the world has ever seen. At this crucial time everything depends upon those who must administer our Government. Congress can do everything in its power and still its ends and purposes may be defeated by incompetency, selfishness, or political considerations on the part of those who are intrusted with the administration of the machinery set up by Congress.

It is to be regretted that the President waited until this month before he realized or acknowledged the necessity of strengthening the banking system and taking the necessary measures to stop the deflation. Had he done this six months ago, or even as late as September of last year, incalculable loss and suffering could have been avoided and many banks and industrial concerns could have been saved from bankruptcy. At the time Congressman SWANK and I urged him to take immediate action, it was his opinion that our crisis was due to conditions that prevailed in foreign nations and not conditions within our own borders. He therefore refused to act upon our suggestions in time for the greatest benefit to result.

In our program submitted to the President we urged that immigration from every country should be prohibited for a period of at least five years to enable us to absorb the labor surplus, and that adequate deportation laws should be enacted that would enable us to immediately deport the several million foreigners illegally in our country and those who are legally here but have committed a criminal offense. I am glad to say that the President agreed with this proposition, and I believe that the great majority of American citizens are in favor of reducing to a minimum the number of foreigners who come to our shores. Our Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, upon which I have the honor to serve, is working earnestly and vigorously upon this matter. Bills have been introduced by myself and others to accomplish this purpose. These bills will be acted upon by the committee in the next few days.

I feel sure that the committee will report out some real measure that will solve for many years this difficult problem. It may be that in the wisdom of the committee we may reduce the quota 90 per cent and thus permit only a few foreigners to come to our shores. This will apply to Mexico and South America as well as to all other countries. It will prevent the legal entry into Texas and the United States of thousands of Mexicans who come to take jobs away from American citizens and to aggravate our economic situation. No greater measure could be enacted by this Congress. It will result in incalculable and inestimable advantages not only to the people of this age and time but to our children's children yet unborn. Had Congress taken this necessary and important step years ago we would not have the spectacle that we to-day witness of 8,000,000 of American citizens walking the streets in idleness.

In our program that we presented to the President we urged that the Government use cotton paper, cloth, and twine, exclusive of all other kind, and that a national program be inaugurated by the President and the Department of Agriculture enlisting the support of the American people in an effort to use more cotton clothing and cotton goods. The production of cotton in the United States is one of the most important industries in our Nation. Millions of people are dependent upon the production and sale of cotton for a living.

Cotton has always been in many sections of our country the chief money crop. If the Government would inaugurate a great program to stimulate the use of cotton goods and to devise new uses for cotton, the demand for this important commodity would materially increase. The Government has heretofore spent considerable money in the endeavor to find new uses for other raw materials produced in the United States. Little attention, however, has been devoted to cotton consumption. We have devoted most of our efforts to the improvement of cotton production, but we have neglected the increase of cotton consumption and the marketing of this important product. Although millions of farmers produce other crops, cotton is their chief money crop, and when we increase the demand and price of cotton we will increase the purchasing power of millions of people, which will hasten the return of normal conditions. I am satisfied that many uses for cotton heretofore unknown can be developed that will restore the cotton industry to a position of profit, and I sincerely regret that the President has not seen fit to act upon our suggestions. No one has suffered from this crisis any more than the farmer. Many corporations have felt the depression for only the past 12 months, but the farmer has felt it for many years. While the farmers were losing millions many industries were making tremendous profits.

In 1929 the United States Steel Corporation made $197,592,000 in profits and in 1930 it made $104,422,000. Even during the panicky year of 1931 it reported a profit of about $13,000,000. During 1931 General Motors Corporation issued a preliminary statement showing net profits of $96,859,000.

Three hundred and thirteen other companies engaged in a variety of different lines of manufacturing and trade reported combined net profits of approximately $218,000,000 in 1931, compared with $435,000,000 in 1930 and $653,000,000 in 1929. During these three years it is impossible to estimate the tremendous losses sustained by labor and agriculture. Therefore, it is obvious that immediate and energetic measures must be adopted to rescue agriculture, labor, and independent business from threatened disaster. I do not say that this bill will do this, but I do say that if it is properly administered it will save several thousands of people from bankruptcy and ruin, and it may revive business and start the wheels of industry moving.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I must acknowledge that I am no authority on banking and currency questions, but this much I do know: That we are faced with a grave situation in the United States. I have profound confidence in the leadership of this House. [Applause.]

I believe that the Speaker of this House is one of the greatest patriots that America ever produced. [Applause.] He has a profound knowledge of the needs of this country, and there is no man living in America to-day who is more familiar with the science of Government and the practical everyday problems than he. I have confidence in the integrity, the patriotism, and the intelligence of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL]. [Applause.] I am willing to follow their leadership in this important financial measure.

There are two types of legislation that are recommended to the American people: One character of legislation proposes direct appropriation to those who are in distress. The other character of legislation is to help people help themselves. Personally I subscribe to the theory that it is better to help the American people help themselves than to create a dangerous precedent during these times of distress that will cause this Republic to wander farther and farther away from the ancient landmarks established by Jefferson and our wise forefathers. [Applause.] I am therefore glad to support this measure with the sincere hope that it may relieve the grave situation in our Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, in my judgment this is the first of the so-called emergency measures which will be of real assistance. It will inflate the currency by placing about three-fourths of a billion dollars more money in circulation. This will mean about $5,500,000,000 in circulation. The trouble with this bill is that it is limited in two respects—as to time and amount. It should not be limited to one year. It should be increased by at least one-half billion dollars. That would mean about $50 per capita in circulation. We should place at least $50 per capita in circulation and keep it there. I dislike the 1-year limitation.

After the war, we had $53 per capita in circulation, and the Government arbitrarily deflated it to thirty-some dollars per capita. The panics have followed. Every panic which we have suffered has been associated with a cruel contraction of the currency. We have gotten out of every panic by inflation. In the light of history this bill should be a positive step toward recovery.

Congress should see to it that another panic shall never come about by a contraction of the currency. If we leave the control of money in the hands of great bankers, there will be future contractions of the currency and future panics. That is the way great finance always bleeds the country.

Expansion of the currency at this time will serve its intended purpose of saving great banking institutions, especially some chain-banking systems now in trouble. Expansion of the currency would have saved many of the 8,000 local banks which have heretofore been closed. There was no such congressional treatment for them. On the contrary, the deflation or contraction of the currency a few years ago, more than any other one thing, broke these 8,000 local banks. The currency was contracted by the Federal Reserve Board at the behest of big finance. This should be fair warning to Congress to take the power over money out of the hands of monopolistic finance and place it back in the hands of Congress, where it was placed by the Constitution. Congress had no business ever to have delegated this power.

The purpose of this bill is to place more money in circulation. We are informed that it will place $750,000,000 more money in circulation. In the light of history the placing of this money in circulation should increase commodity prices. The economic condition which we are now suffering seems to be different from any condition which has ever before existed. It may be that these different conditions will repudiate history and this inflation of the currency will not increase the commodity prices.

If this inflation of the currency increases commodity prices, agriculture will be quickly and greatly benefited. Before we can come out of our present economic despair agricultural prices must be increased. There can be no economic recovery in this country so long as the 27,000,000 farm people are unable to receive enough for their products to pay their taxes and buy the products of industry.

It is too much to expect this inflation or any other move to increase farm prices enough to reach a parity with the prices of industrial commodities and with taxes. The taxes of the country are 170 per cent higher than they were for the five years before the war. There is no possible way to increase the price of farm products to a point where they are 170 per cent higher than they were five years before the war; therefore our work is not completed with the enactment of this bill. It is inevitable that the public expenses must be reduced in order that the tax bill may be brought down to some sort of a parity with the price of farm products.

During the last 10 years we have built up in America a monopolistic system whereby the profits of all of the local communities are daily drained from those communities into a few great centers of finance. This system is commonly known as the chain system. It is absentee ownership of all local institutions which will pay a profit. It makes no difference how much we increase the circulation it is inevitable that in a short time the great mass of people in all of the local communities will be impoverished so long as we daily drain the profits of the community into a few financial quarters. Again our labors are not completed with the enactment of this bill which will inflate the currency. If we are to build up a social and economic structure in this country, the back of monopoly must be broken to the end that the price of industrial commodities will be on a parity with farm commodities and local communities may retain a share of the wealth which they produce.

There is something else which must be corrected, and that is the unemployment problem. Assuming that the inflation of the currency will restore the buying power of the 27,000,000 agricultural people, it will still be impossible for American industry to sufficiently increase its volume of business to furnish employment for more than a reasonable part of the unemployed. It must be remembered that all of the unemployment is not due to the bankruptcy and insolvency of agriculture. Only a goodly part of it is due to the insolvency and bankruptcy of agriculture—therefore only that part of the unemployment which is due to the insolvency of agriculture can be eliminated by a restoration of the buying power of the agricultural section.

Much of our unemployment in industry is due to the loss of foreign markets. There are only two basic ways to produce wealth in this world—one is to produce the raw products of the farm and of the mine and the other is to convert the raw products into finished manufactured products. Every nation in order to survive must have a surplus of either finished or raw products. Europe can not have a surplus of the raw products of the mine, because precious minerals are not bedded in the soil of Europe. Europe, with her excessive population and limited area, can not produce a surplus of the raw products of the farm. Therefore Europe must rely upon the finished products of the factory for her marketing surplus of commodities.

In the nature of things Europe must have and will have the manufactured markets of the world. By necessity, she will have them if they must be produced by peonage labor. Europe had these markets of the world before the war. When Europe went to war she not only surrendered her markets for manufactured products in Africa, South America, and Asia, but she became a purchaser of the commodities of the factory. In this situation American manufacturing institutions inherited the markets of the neutral world for manufactured commodities and also inherited a goodly part of the markets of Europe for manufactured commodities. As a result the manufacturing industry of the United States enjoyed a prosperity such that no manufacturing industry of any nation of the world ever enjoyed. This great prosperity for American factories brought about a great demand for labor and American labor enjoyed the highest wages ever known. As a result of this situation millions of men went from the farm to the factory.

When the war ended, by necessity, Europe went back into the manufacturing business. Day by day, slowly but surely, she has been regaining her lost markets in the world. As she regained these markets, day by day, slowly but surely, American factories lost them proportionately. As a result, American factories find themselves with an export market reduced to the market which was theirs before the war.

The Department of Commerce reports that American exports for the month of December, 1931, were the lowest of any month since 1914 and before the war. A factory must have a demand for its products before it can employ labor to make the products. So far as the export business is concerned, American factories need no more and can use no more labor than they used before the war in 1914. Therefore, as millions of men went from the farms to the factories when American factories enjoyed the markets of the world, to-day a similar number must go from the factories back to the farms, since the factories no longer have these markets of the world. Therefore no matter how much we inflate the currency nor how much we may rehabilitate agriculture, those men who formerly manufactured commodities for export will be unemployed.

Something else has brought about unemployment. Since the war, science has invented great machines and we have called them labor-saving devices. It has been nothing less than hypocrisy to call them labor-saving devices. We have used them to cast men into unemployment. If we were really using them as labor-saving devices in a Christian and humane sense, we would be shortening the number of hours of labor rather than reducing the number employed. There is no correcting the unemployment problem until the hours of labor have been shortened enough to take up the slack which has been brought about by modern machinery.

Until the unemployment problem is solved it is inevitable that there will be economic and social chaos in America.

Assuming that in the light of history this plan of inflation succeeds and increases the price of farm commodities, we have only made the unemployment problem more acute because we shall have increased the cost of living. We may put three or four million men back to work, but the remaining three of four million of unemployed will be in a worse situation than they are in now, because their cost of living will have been increased.

Assuming that the inflation, in keeping with the experience of history, will help to correct the present economic crime against agriculture, still our labors have only begun. Prosperity and happiness will not be restored to this country until at least four more things take place: First, the back of monopoly must be broken in order that local communities may be able to retain a fair share of the profits which they produce; second, Government expenses must be reduced in order that the tax bill may be reduced in keeping with the ability of the producers to pay taxes; third, until several million men are returned to the small farm in order to solve the unemployment problem; and fourth, until the hours of labor are reduced sufficiently to furnish employment for those who are now unemployed on account of modern machinery.

Mr. CANFIELD. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, we are considering legislation to-day that, in my opinion, should have been considered and passed a year or more ago. Had it been passed at that time hundreds of banks that have been closed would still be open, thousands of business firms that have failed would still be doing business. The deposits in many of the banks that have been closed would not be tied up and much of it lost and thousands upon thousands of men that have been thrown out of work would be employed.

Complaint has been made about this bill being considered under the suspension of the rules. In reply to this I will say the only complaint that should be made is that the rules were not suspended to consider legislation of this kind at least a year ago, for if it had been done at that time the problems of many would be quite different to-day and business conditions, especially in the smaller cities and country districts, would be quite different.

Some say they object to this bill because it will inflate the currency. Gentlemen of the House, if there was ever a time in the history of the country when we needed inflation it is now. One of our principal troubles at the present time is that our currency has been contracted too much, and if we ever expect to get started in the other direction, we must have some inflation.

At the present time we are trying to pay off our obligations made when conditions were normal with a 50-cent dollar. Money borrowed at 6 per cent when conditions were normal is being paid for with a contracted currency, which means we are paying about 12 per cent instead of 6 per cent. Under such conditions our farmers and business men are unable to meet their obligations, and unless we have an inflation of some kind, they can never expect to meet their obligations.

The purpose of this legislation, as I understand it, is to liberalize the credit facilities of the Federal reserve system, to afford greater credit accommodations by member banks, and to ease conditions in the general financial structure, which, if properly handled, should rehabilitate business.

The bill provides that loans may be made to groups of member banks independently owned and not less than five in number in any Federal reserve district upon time or demand promissory notes. It also provides that any individual member bank that is unable to offer security, eligible under existing law, may obtain loans from a Federal reserve bank on satisfactory security, approved by a majority of the Federal Reserve Board.

It further provides that the Federal Reserve Board shall be authorized to use direct obligations of the United States as a basis for the issue of currency with the understanding that under this authority the Federal reserve notes issued must be protected by a gold reserve of 40 per cent. This will make it possible for approximately $2,000,000,000 to be put into the member banks within a very short time and can not help but ease conditions in all parts of the country.

Under this bill authority is given to the Federal reserve system to put money into the market to take the place of credit tied up in frozen loans, and if in its administration by the Federal Reserve Board the purpose of the bill is carried out, it can not but help all classes of business.

If our banks are put in position where they can take care of the demands they have for loans, business can again start to operate. Men with money and those who are in position to get money will start to buy because they realize that prices will advance; this will mean that the retailer and wholesaler will have to buy. Our factories and mills will start to operate. Labor will be again employed and there should be a demand for our farm products at a fair price.

According to the Federal Reserve Board, the number of bank suspensions in the United States in 1931 was 2,290, with deposits of $1,759,000,000. For 1931, R. G. Dunn &

Co. report 1,440 bank failures in the United States, with liabilities of $1,396,554,484.

Some of the banks that have suspended business will be able to reopen and the passage of this bill should help them, but those that have failed are closed forever; but, in my opinion, had a bill like this been passed 12 months ago many of them would not have been forced to close.

In 1929 the total value of the major farm crops in the United States, as reported by the United States Department of Agriculture, was $8,088,494,000. In 1930 the value of the same crops was $5,818,820,000. In 1931 it was only $4,122,850,000, a decrease of $3,965,644,000 in two years.

In 1929 the value of the total wheat crop of 806,000,000 bushels was $840,000,000. In 1931 the value of the crop of 892,000,000 bushels was $395,000,000, a shrinkage of $445,000,000.

In 1929 the value of the corn crop of 2,600,000,000 bushels was $2,048,000,000. In 1931 the value of the crop of 2,056,000,000 was $920,000,000, a shrinkage of $1,128,000,000.

In 1929 the value of the oat crop of 1,238,000,000 bushels was $538,000,000, whereas the 1931 crop of 1,112,000,000 bushels had a value of $256,000,000, a drop of more than $280,000,000.

In 1929 the value of the cotton crop of approximately 14,900,000 bales was $1,225,032,000. In 1931 the crop of 16,900,000 bales had a value of only $485,611,000, a decrease of more than $750,000,000.

During the harvest season of 1931 wheat sold at the farms in some instances at less than 25 cents per bushel. In October the price on the Chicago exchange dropped to 44⅝ cents, the lowest level in the history of the exchange and comparing with low levels of 50 cents in 1894 and 48⅜ cents in 1895.

This means, as you all know, that tens of thousands of farmers have been thrown into bankruptcy, their farms are being sold at sheriff's sales, and tenancy is increasing. The Census Bureau survey shows that in 1930, 42.4 per cent of all farms were operated by tenants, as compared with 38.1 per cent in 1920 and only about 25 per cent 50 years ago. It is estimated that this has now been increased to approximately 45 per cent.

From 1920 to 1930 the total value of farm lands and buildings in the United States fell from $66,316,002,602 to $47,879,838,358, a drop of $18,436,164,244, and it is estimated that the drop in the last two years will make the total value of farm lands and buildings to-day approximately $40,000,000,000.

With these staggering figures of farm conditions confronting us and with our business men throughout the country, many of whom are being forced into bankruptcy, others unable to continue to operate their business, with between seven and eight million laboring men idle, and approximately that many men working only 1, 2, or 3 days a week, as I stated in the beginning, if there was ever a time in the history of this country when we need inflation in our currency, it is now.

Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, there is only one objection I have to this bill, and that is where it authorizes the Federal Reserve Board to put money into circulation. I wish there was a specific direction given to them to use the machinery set up by this bill for the purpose of seeing that at least $2,000,000,000 in money is put into circulation at once, for if that was done, business conditions throughout the country would improve immediately, men that are idle would again be employed, and it would make it possible for the farmers of our country to get a fair price for their products. This is what is needed and what we must have before prosperity can be restored.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, in voting for this bill to give the Federal Reserve Board more power I hope and feel that I may be doing the best thing, and yet I doubt it almost enough to lead me to cast a vote against the measure. It will enable the Federal Reserve Board, the big banks, and great monopolies to put more money in circulation if they will, but will they?

Even now without this new law they can put much more money into circulation, but they are refusing to do so, and by their centralization policy have destroyed thousands of small banks and enterprises, caused the loss of millions of deposits, brought about an awful unemployment situation, and precipitated the greatest depression of all time. I very much fear we are giving this board more power which it will use against the people rather than for them.

This bill is on the wrong principle, in that it brings about greater centralization of political and financial power and helps those who already have control of the money of the Nation, even to the destruction of the masses of the American people. I am afraid of the bill, and yet the situation at this time is so distressing that I shall whip myself into voting for it, hoping and praying that the great majority of Democrats and Republicans in this House who are supporting it are right and that it may in some way give some relief in this awful hour. If this bill only was worded so as to put all these millions of new money into actual circulation in the hands of the many, I would be enthusiastically for it. As it is, I am resolving every doubt in favor of my heartfelt hope that its operation will prove to be more beneficial than I anticipate, and shall vote for it.

I greatly fear, though, that it will only provide for a greater accumulation of money and power in the hands of those who are already a menace to our country and that we are unintentionally committing a great wrong rather than rendering a real service, as we so much hope.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the Glass-Steagall bill. This bill and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill are both designed to provide credit. They are distinguished, however, as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance bill creates credit by plunging the country further into debt. The Glass-Steagall bill frees credit reserves that already exist. It has, therefore, one great virtue at least: It takes no money from the Treasury; it does not flood the market with more Federal securities; it does not give great wealth further opportunity to escape taxation through the issuance of tax-exempt bonds, and therefore, does not tend to increase the burden of taxes on real or personal property; and, finally, it does not ask the taxpayer to come to the relief of private business.

Whether this bill will be administered chiefly with an eye toward European affairs or for the improvement of domestic affairs I do not know. If it is to be used only to meet the threat of France to withdraw her gold deposits in this country, to throw us off the gold standard, and thus dictate to us her terms of debt settlements, then its benefits will be short lived. Even in that case I favor any necessary preparation to meet her threat and to tell her to take her gold. I do not want this country to be run by a foreign government. I again mention the fact that by the moratorium we suspended debts due us from France and secured no protection against our debtor raiding our gold. The moratorium threw away an offset against the raid.

If, however, the administration of this bill goes beyond the necessities created by our fatuous foreign policies, then the bill should be of very genuine service in freeing credit, preventing further bank failures, stopping the panic, restoring confidence, and starting commodity prices on the upgrade. It is evident that by the hoarding of money and the freezing of credit money has become too scarce, and therefore too dear, and commodities have become too cheap. Until and unless that process is reversed the depression will get worse.

So long as commodity prices are on the down grade no one will buy or employ beyond actual necessities. If, however, this bill does start commodity prices upward, and the country becomes convinced that it will not be able to buy so cheaply in the future, buying will start, orders will go to factories and farms, and employment will accelerate. I hope sincerely it will be so administered as to produce that result.

By passing this bill Congress will have pointed the way and provided the means by which existing credit facilities may be used for the benefit of the entire country. If the Federal Reserve Board will now use the power given to them by this bill for the benefit of the entire country and all of its people, and not for the benefit of the few who have apparently largely controlled its policies in the past, we may see by the enactment of this legislation the turning point of the depression.

To the extent that this bill has recuperative power, it is unfortunate that the administration has delayed action until our situation has become truly desperate. We have waited until the patient was at the last gasp, and then jammed this bill through in three days' time. If the administration had had the courage to admit a year or more ago that the country was in a serious depression under Republican control, we could, in all likelihood, have saved hundreds if not thousands of banks in the West, millions of depositors, and thousands of farm and home foreclosures. It was only when the wave of bank failures finally reached the East that those in control of our financial fortunes took real steps to check the disaster. Until that time the situation had played into the hands of those who favor the concentration of credit in a few hands.

A real injustice has been done also to the wage earners of the country in delaying this action until they had patriotically accepted wage cuts. Now, if commodity prices rise, the wage earners who have taken these cuts will feel that they have been left holding the bag. If commodity prices now rise, wages must also be permitted to rise, in order that the wage earner may purchase the commodities.

If commodities and other values rise, debtors may save further foreclosures and tax sales and the loss of their equities. The credit of municipalities will improve, for on account of the tremendous bond issues all municipalities as well as private individuals and private corporations are debtors. Taxes are too high, the cost of government must be reduced, and yet it must be pointed out that in terms of wheat and corn and wages taxes and interest have doubled or tripled wholly independently of the action of tax-levying bodies or the holders of mortgages. Some people are already worried about inflation. Let us confine our worries for the present to deflation. After we have put an end to a devastating deflation, we can then check harmful inflation.

In conclusion, let me say that the principles contained in this bill are not new. As long ago as 1908 Senator Owen, of Oklahoma, advocated that in times of stringency provision be made for the issuance of emergency currency, based, in part, upon the obligations of the United States, which are good if anything in this country is good. We must somehow strengthen our banking system so as to prevent the undue expansion and contraction of credit. We must make it impossible for selfish interests to manipulate the credit of the Nation, to inflate and unload at the peak, to deflate and buy once more at the bottom. Between the upper and lower millstones of overinflation and overdeflation the life savings of home owners, of honest, frugal workers on farm and in factory are ground into dust.

While I am hopeful of benefits from this bill, nevertheless it is but one step in the rehabilitation of the country. The economies of machinery must be more widely distributed. Men must be able to buy what they or the machines make, or the machines themselves will get rusty for want of customers. Mass production means mass distribution, and mass distribution means purchasing power in the hands of the millions.

Everything has been deflated in this country except the cost of government. We must now deflate bureaucracy. Commissions, boards, bureaus have grown like hothouse plants during the past 10 years and, like vampires, grown fat on the blood of taxpayers; and we must not forget that the greatest mushroom of all is the Bureau of Commerce, so lately presided over by Herbert Hoover.

Mr. CROWE. Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the legislation just passed by the House to liberalize the credit of the Federal reserve system is a big move in the return of prosperity.

It was a pleasure and a privilege to support this measure, because it is the first real piece of legislation enacted during this Congress that is aimed at and can be expected to aid people in all walks of life. In other words, with a loosening of credit, with more money in circulation, it means the smaller and farming communities will have an opportunity to secure more money. The small banks through this loosening of credit have eligible paper, notes, and so forth, which are good but the indorsers unable to pay at this time, therefore called "frozen," can now use such paper for rediscounting purposes at the Federal reserve banks, thereby increasing their ready cash with which to help the several communities. This measure or some similar measure will no doubt become permanent legislation.

On account of the tremendous amount of bank withdrawals and hoarding, the currency in circulation dwindled to a point where this legislation was not only needed but it had to be written.

When the Wall Street debacle occurred in fall of 1929 and when the bottom dropped out, instead of the constant cry of "Business just around the corner," then or soon after honest legislation such as this should have been written. If other carefully prepared legislation, made with an idea and purpose to help the workingman, had been made, legislation honestly written to aid the farmer and small business man, we either would not have undergone this terrible panic, or at least it would not have become a devastating rout.

In spite of the approaching storm and distressed condition of the country, the expense of government continued to grow, more and more boards were created, more and more officeholders appointed, thousands of them unnecessary. The most skillful business man could under no circumstances live and operate a business under such a load and strain.

It is difficult for many to understand why some people can spend money freely and yet make or accumulate money while others spend money freely and go broke. The reason is, the one spends freely but gets value received, while others spend freely and get little in return.

We hear much to-day of the dole. I am opposed to a dole. I hope our country soon is able to get away from the doles which it has in almost every county in the United States in the form of county charities, and so forth. All of these are needed as emergency measures, but it is nothing more nor less than a dole in disguise. To her sorrow England had a government dole which, while vicious, was only a small part of England's financial troubles.

According to Nation's Business of December, 1931, England went off the gold standard for one main reason. In 25 years the nation got one-third of the national income from the public purse.

When Queen Victoria died public expenditures of Great Britain were 5 per cent of the national income. Mr. Gladstone's last budget was under one-half billion dollars, while the national income was $10,000,000,000, or 5 per cent. To-day the national income of Great Britain is estimated at $20,000,000,000, while the public expenditures, national and local, are not less than $7,500,000,000, or more than 30 per cent of the national income. That is the reason for England's going off the gold standard.

The Government of the United States is fast climbing with its Government expense and has reached a point where 1 out of each 11 men are in the employ of the Government, either in local, State, or national branches, and the numbers are mounting.

I am in favor of every bureau and department of this Government being fine-combed, and eliminate every possible bit of waste. The millions of dollars wasted in our Government would put thousands of our idle, scattered all over this country, at work if spent for necessary Government buildings and improvements.

By illustration, if a farmer needs additional help, he can afford to furnish board and keep an extra hand, because he will produce something to bring a return. But suppose the hired man came in as a "star" boarder and drew his pay, he would soon impoverish the farmer. Just so is it with government. It is time, and high time, to throw the "star" boarder out!

We have given our support generously during this Congress to the big-business interests of this country, which was imperative. I have joined in the needful emergency pieces of legislation and did so whole-heartedly. I am for my country first. But now with 30,000,000 farmer folks in red ink and thousands losing their farms and homes, I want to join hands and help pass legislation which will really aid the farmer.

With eight to ten million wage earners idle, they and their families totaling upwards to 30,000,000 more, with no finance, hundreds of thousands hungry, I want to see some legislation enacted to help them.

EMERGENCY OF FIRST MAGNITUDE

In a great crisis, as of war, our Government would issue bonds with which to buy the sinews of war.

To-day with millions idle, their children undernourished and impoverished, it is time our Government through its wise leaders laid down constructive measures, not to give a dole but to give work to the unemployed.

It is high time our great industrialists joined in the movement to help find employment for the millions of unemployed.

OVERPRODUCTION v. UNDERCONSUMPTION

By putting our unemployed to work their wages would as soon as received go to buy food and clothing and to pay their debts and taxes. It would soon begin to use up the vast overproduction supplies of grain and farm products.

Workers could save their homes, farmers could pay their taxes and the interest on their mortgages. The expenditure would make for increased prosperity, larger incomes among the masses. A great amount of the overproduction in America to-day is caused by underconsumption among the millions unemployed and by loss of purchasing power of the farmer.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to suspend the rules and pass the bill as amended.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS FOR THE CALENDAR YEAR 1931 (H. DOC. NO. 248)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith for the information of the Congress the report of the Director General of Railroads for the calendar year 1931.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 15, 1932.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. NELSON of Missouri on account of serious illness of his mother.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be privileged to address the House for 20 minutes on Thursday morning next following the disposition of matters on the Speaker's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that he may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes on next Thursday after the disposition of business on the Speaker's desk. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I suggest to the gentleman that we have been objecting to these special orders right along. Perhaps the gentleman can get time from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] on the next appropriation bill. I am sure the gentleman can get time to speak under general debate on that bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I would much like to speak Thursday morning.

Mr. RAINEY. I presume there is good reason for the gentleman's desire, and I would like to agree to it, but that has been against our rules.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman has his privilege and so have I.

Mr. RAINEY. The other day I had an agreement with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that an agreement to permit the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] to address the House would not be considered as a precedent, and that that should not be followed by other speeches. I shall have to object unless the gentleman will agree to take time in general debate on an appropriation bill.

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman may exercise his privilege.

Mr. RAINEY. Then I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the majority leader about the program to-morrow. I suppose we will first have the vote on the constitutional amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes; immediately after the reading of the Journal, and then the Department of the Interior appropriation bill.

Mr. SNELL. It is not the gentleman's intention to start a second appropriation bill to-morrow?

Mr. RAINEY. No. We may not finish the other bill.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 42 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 16, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

STATE OF WISCONSIN.

Joint resolution relating to the protection of American producers of pulpwood against unfair competition resulting from the depreciation of foreign currencies

Whereas it has come to the attention of the Wisconsin Legislature that foreign pulp is now being shipped into the port of New York, duty free, and is being sold for much less than the amount it costs American manufacturers to produce this product, even at the present low price of pulpwood and mill wages; and

Whereas it is apparent that importers of this product are being given an unfair advantage over American manufacturers in view of the fact that they are paying for the product in depreciated foreign currencies and selling it for American gold dollars; and

Whereas this competition results in hardship not only upon the American manufacturers of pulp but also upon all large and small producers of pulpwood and all other persons engaged directly or indirectly in this industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the assembly (the senate concurring), That this legislature, in special session assembled, respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States to enact remedial legislation to protect domestic producers against this unfair competition, due to depreciated foreign currencies, and so give employment to large numbers of American citizens in the manufacture of pulp; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of the Congress of the United States and to all Wisconsin Members thereof.

OPINION OF SUPREME COURT—RECALCITRANT WITNESSES IN OIL INVESTIGATION

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it will be recalled that certain witnesses, much desired in the litigation growing out of the leasing of the naval oil reserves, found it convenient to go over to France, where they escaped the service of a subpœna. That induced the Congress of the United States to enact a law providing for the service of subpœnas upon such witnesses in a foreign country and for proceedings against them in contempt in case they should refuse to obey the subpœna.

Mr. Blackmer, one of the witnesses, did disobey the subpœna and was fined twice in the amount of $30,000. Judgment of the contempt proceedings was affirmed by the District Court of Appeals. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, which on yesterday, by a unanimous court, affirmed the decision of the court below in an opinion written by the Chief Justice, which I ask may be incorporated in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the opinion was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

NOS. 200 AND 201—OCTOBER TERM, 1931

200. Harry M. Blackmer, petitioner, v. The United States of America. 201. Harry M. Blackmer, petitioner, v. The United States of America. On writs of certiorari to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia.

Mr. Chief Justice Hughes delivered the opinion of the court.

The petitioner, Harry M. Blackmer, a citizen of the United States, resident in Paris, France, was adjudged guilty of contempt of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for failure to respond to subpœnas served upon him in France and requiring him to appear as a witness on behalf of the United States at a criminal trial in that court. Two subpœnas were issued, for appearances at different times, and there was a separate proceeding with respect to each. The two cases were heard together, and a fine of $30,000, with costs, was imposed in each case, to be satisfied out of the property of the petitioner which had been seized by order of the court. The decrees were affirmed by the Court of Appeals of the District (49 F. (2d) 523) and this court granted writs of certiorari.

The subpœnas were issued and served, and the proceedings to punish for contempt were taken, under the provisions of the act of July 3, 1926, chapter 762, 44 Statutes 835, United States Code, title 28, sections 711–718.[1]

The statute provides that whenever the attendance at the trial of a criminal action of a witness abroad, who is "a citizen of the United States or domiciled therein," is desired by the Attorney General, or any assistant or district attorney acting under him, the judge of the court in which the action is pending may order a subpœna to issue, to be addressed to a consul of the United States and to be served by him personally upon the witness with a tender of traveling expenses. (Secs. 2, 3.) Upon proof of such service and of the failure of the witness to appear, the court may make an order requiring the witness to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and upon the issue of such an order the court may direct that property belonging to the witness and within the United States may be seized and held to satisfy any judgment which may be rendered against him in the proceeding. (Secs. 4, 5.) Provision is made for personal service of the order upon the witness and also for its publication in a newspaper of general circulation in the district where the court is sitting. (Sec. 6.) If, upon the hearing, the charge is sustained, the court may adjudge the witness guilty of contempt and impose upon him a fine not exceeding $100,000, to be satisfied by a sale of the property seized. (Sec. 7.) This statute and the proceedings against the petitioner are assailed as being repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

"Be it enacted, etc., That whenever letters rogatory shall issue out of any court of the United States, either with or without interrogatories addressed to any court of any foreign country, to take the testimony of any witness, being a citizen of the United States or domiciled therein, and such witness, having been personally notified by it according to the practice of such court, to appear and testify pursuant to such letters rogatory, and such witness shall neglect to appear, or having appeared shall decline, refuse, or neglect to answer to any question which may be propounded to him by or under the authority of such court, to which he would be required to make answer were he being examined before the court issuing such letters, the court out of which said letters issued may upon proper showing order that a subpœna issue addressed to any consul of the United States within any country in which such witness may be, commanding such witness to appear before the said court at a time and place therein designated.

"SEC. 2. Whenever the attendance at the trial of any criminal action of a witness, being a citizen of the United States or domiciled therein, who is beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, is desired by the Attorney General or any assistant or district attorney acting under him, the judge of the court before which such action is pending, or who is to sit in the trial of the same, may, upon proper showing, order that a subpœna issue, addressed to any consul of the United States within any country in which such witness may be commanding such witness to appear before the said court at a time and place therein designated.

"SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of any consul of the United States within any country in which such witness may be at the request of the clerk of the court issuing any subpœna under this act or at the request of the officer causing such subpœna to be issued, to serve the same personally upon such witness and also to serve any orders to show cause, rules, judgments, or decrees when requested by the court or United States marshal, and to make a return thereof to the court out of which the same issued, first tendering to the witness the amount of his necessary expenses in traveling to and from the place at which the court sits and his attendance thereon, which amount shall be determined by the judge on issuing the order for the subpœna and supplied to the consul making the service.

"SEC. 4. If the witness so served shall neglect or refuse to appear as in such subpœna directed, the court out of which it was issued shall, upon proof being made of the service and default, issue an order directing the witness to appear before the court at a time in such order designated to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt and be punished accordingly.

"SEC. 5. Upon issuing such order the court may, upon the giving of security for any damages which the recusing witness may have suffered, should the charge be dismissed (except that no security shall be required of the United States), direct as a part of such order that the property of the recusing witness, at any place within the United States, or so much thereof in value as the court may direct, shall be levied upon and seized by the marshal of said court in the manner provided by law or the rule of the court for a levy or seizure under execution, to be held to satisfy any judgment that may be rendered against such witness in the proceeding so instituted.

"SEC. 6. The marshal, having made such levy, shall thereupon forward to the consul of any country where the recusing witness may be a copy of the order to show cause why such witness should not be adjudged guilty of contempt with the request that said consul make service of the same personally upon the recusing witness, and shall cause to be published such order to show cause and for the sequestration of the property of such witness, in some newspaper of general circulation in the district within which the court issuing such order sits, once each week for six consecutive weeks.

"SEC. 7. On the return day of such order or any later day to which the hearing may by the court be continued, proof shall be taken; and if the charge of recusancy against the witness shall be sustained, the court shall adjudge him guilty of contempt and notwithstanding any limitation upon the power of the court generally to punish for contempt, impose upon him a fine not exceeding $100,000 and direct that the amount thereof, with the costs of the proceeding, be satisfied, unless paid, by a sale of the property of the witness so seized or levied upon, such sale to be conducted upon the notice required and in the manner provided for sales upon execution.

"SEC. 8. Any judgment rendered pursuant to this act upon service by publication only may be opened for answer within the time and in the manner provided in section 57 of the Judicial Code."

First. The principal objections to the statute are that it violates the due process clause of the fifth amendment. These contentions are: (1) That the "Congress has no power to authorize United States consuls to serve process except as permitted by treaty"; (2) that the act does not provide "a valid method of acquiring judicial jurisdiction to render personal judgment against defendant and judgment against his property"; (3) that the act "does not require actual or any other notice to defendant of the offense or of the Government's claim against his property"; (4) that the provisions "for hearing and judgment in the entire absence of the accused and without his consent" are invalid; and (5) that the act is "arbitrary, capricious, and unreasonable."

While it appears that the petitioner removed his residence to France in the year 1924, it is undisputed that he was, and continued to be, a citizen of the United States. He continued to owe allegiance to the United States. By virtue of the obligations of citizenship, the United States retained its authority over him, and he was bound by its laws made applicable to him in a foreign country. Thus, although resident abroad, the petitioner remained subject to the taxing power of the United States. (Cook v. Tait, 265 U. S. 47, 54, 56.) For disobedience to its laws through conduct abroad he was subject to punishment in the courts of the United States. (United States v. Bowman, 260 U. S. 94, 102.) With respect to such an exercise of authority, there is no question of international law,[2] but solely of the purport of the municipal law which establishes the duties of the citizen in relation to his own government.[3] While the legislation of the Congress, unless the contrary intent appears, is construed to appl yonly within the Territorial jurisdiction of the United States, the question of its application, so far as citizens of the United States in foreign countries are concerned, is one of construction, not of legislative power. (American Banana Co. v. United Fruit Co., 213 U. S. 347, 357; United States v. Bowman, supra; Robertson v. Labor Board, 268 U. S. 619, 622.) Nor can it be doubted that the United States possesses the power inherent in sovereignty to require the return to this country of a citizen, resident elsewhere, whenever the public interest requires it, and to penalize him in case of refusal. (Compare Bartue and the Duchess of Suffolk's case, 2 Dyer's Rep. 176b, 73 Eng. Rep. 388; Knowles v. Luce, Moore 109, 72 Eng. Rep. 473.[4]) What in England was the prerogative of the sovereign in this respect pertains under our constitutional system to the national authority which may be exercised by the Congress by virtue of the legislative power to prescribe the duties of the citizens of the United States. It is also beyond controversy that one of the duties which the citizen owes to his government is to support the administration of justice by attending its courts and giving his testimony whenever he is properly summoned. (United States v. Blair, 250 U. S. 269, 281.) And the Congress may provide for the performance of this duty and prescribe penalties for disobedience.

In the present instance the question concerns only the method of enforcing the obligation.[5] The jurisdiction of the United States over its absent citizen, so far as the binding effect of its legislation is concerned, is a jurisdiction in personam, as he is personally bound to take notice of the laws that are applicable to him and to obey them. (United States v. Bowman, supra.) But for the exercise of judicial jurisdiction in personam there must be due process, which requires appropriate notice of the judicial action and an opportunity to be heard. For this notice and opportunity the statute provides. The authority to require the absent citizen to return and testify necessarily implies the authority to give him notice of the requirement. As his attendance is needed in court, it is appropriate that the Congress should authorize the court to direct the notice to be given and that it should be in the customary form of a subpœna. Obviously, the requirement would be nugatory if provision could not be made for its communication to the witness in the foreign country. The efficacy of an attempt to provide constructive service in this country would rest upon the presumption that the notice would be given in a manner calculated to reach the witness abroad. (McDonald v. Mabee, 243 U. S. 90, 92.) The question of the validity of the provision for actual service of the subpœna in a foreign country is one that arises solely between the Government of the United States and the citizen. The mere giving of such a notice to the citizen in the foreign country of the requirement of his Government that he shall return is in no sense an invasion of any right of the foreign government and the citizen has no standing to invoke any such supposed right. While consular privileges in foreign countries are the appropriate subjects of treaties,[6] it does not follow that every act of a consul, as, e. g., in communicating with citizens of his own country, must be predicated upon a specific provision of a treaty. The intercourse of friendly nations, permitting travel and residence of the citizens of each in the territory of the other, presupposes and facilitates such communications. In selecting the consul for the service of the subpœna the Congress merely prescribed a method deemed to assure the desired result but in no sense essential. The consul was not directed to perform any function involving consular privileges or depending upon any treaty relating to them, but simply to act as any designated person might act for the Government in conveying to the citizen the actual notice of the requirement of his attendance. The point raised by the petitioner with respect to the provision for the service of the subpœna abroad is without merit.

As the Congress could define the obligation, it could prescribe a penalty to enforce it. And as the default lay in disobedience to an authorized direction of the court, it constituted a contempt of court and the Congress could provide for procedure appropriate in contempt cases. The provision of the statute for punishment for contempt is applicable only "upon proof being made of the service and default." (Sec. 4.) That proof affords a proper basis for the proceeding, and provision is made for personal service upon the witness of the order to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty. For the same reasons as those which sustain the service of the subpœna abroad it was competent to provide for the service of the order in like manner. It is only after a hearing pursuant to the order to show cause, and upon proof sustaining the charge, that the court can impose the penalty. The petitioner urges that the statute does not require notice of the offense, but the order to show cause is to be issued after the witness has failed to obey the subpœna demanding his attendance and the order is to be made by the court before which he was required to appear. This is sufficient to apprise the witness of the nature of the proceeding and he has full opportunity to be heard. The further contention is made that as the offense is a criminal one it is a violation of due process to hold the hearing and to proceed to judgment in the absence of the defendant. The argument misconstrues the nature of the proceeding. "While contempt may be an offense against the law and subject to appropriate punishment, certain it is that since the foundation of our Government, proceedings to punish such offenses have been regarded as sui generis and not 'criminal prosecutions' within the sixth amendment or common understanding." (Myers v. United States, 264 U. S. 95, 104, 105.) See also Bessette v. Conkey (194 U. S. 324, 336, 337); Michaelson v. United States (266 U. S. 42, 65, 66); ex parte Grossman (267 U. S. 87, 117, 118). The requirement of due process in such a case is satisfied by suitable notice and adequate opportunity to appear and to be heard. Cf. Cooke v. United States (267 U. S. 517, 537).

The authorization of the seizure of the property belonging to the defaulting witness and within the United States upon the issue of the order to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt (sec. 5) affords a provisional remedy, the propriety of which rests upon the validity of the contempt proceeding. As the witness is liable to punishment by fine if upon the hearing he is found guilty of contempt, no reason appears why his property may not be seized to provide security for the payment of the penalty. The proceeding conforms to familiar practice where absence or other circumstance makes a provisional remedy appropriate. See Cooper v. Reynolds (10 Wall. 308, 318). The order that is to be served upon the witness contains the direction for the seizure. The property is to be held pending the hearing and is to be applied to the satisfaction of the fine, if imposed and unless it is paid. Given the obligation of the witness to respond to the subpœna the showing of his default after service and the validity of the provision for a fine in case default is not excused, there is no basis for objection to the seizure upon constitutional grounds. The argument that the statute creates an unreasonable classification is untenable. The disobedience of the defaulting witness to a lawful requirement of the court, and not the fact that he owns property, is the ground of his liability. He is not the subject of unconstitutional discrimination simply because he has property which may be appropriated to the satisfaction of a lawful claim.

Second. What has already been said also disposes of the contention that the statute provides for an unreasonable search and seizure in violation of the fourth amendment. It authorizes a levy upon property of the witness at any place within the United States in the manner provided by law or rule of court for levy or seizure under execution. A levy in such a manner, either provisionally or finally, to satisfy the liability of the owner is not within the constitutional prohibition.

The petitioner raises the further and distinct point that the statute limits the availability of the subpœna to the Government and that "by excluding defendants in criminal prosecutions" from the right to such a subpœna violates the provision of the sixth amendment that the accused shall have "compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor." We need not consider

C., title 18, sec. 5.

S. 714; Galpin v. Page, 18 Wall. 350, 369; Harkness v. Hyde, 98 U. S. 476, 478; Riverside & Dan River Cotton Mills v. Menefee, 237 U. S. 189, 193; McDonald v. Mabee, 243 U. whether the statute requires the construction for which the petitioner contends, as in any event the petitioner, a recalcitrant witness, is not entitled to raise the question. (Nelson v. United States, 201 U. S. 92, 115; Southern Railway Co. v. King, 217 U. S. 524, 534; Jeffrey Manufacturing Co. v. Blagg, 235 U. S. 571, 576; Blair v. United States, supra, at p. 282.)

Third. The statute being valid, the question remains as to the procedure in its application against the petitioner. He insists that the showing for the issue of the subpœnas requiring him to attend was inadequate. But the "proper showing" required was for the purpose of satisfying the court that the subpœnas should issue. The petitions, in the instant cases, were presented to the judge of the court by the official representatives of the Government and their statement as to the materiality and importance of the testimony expected from the witness was unquestionably sufficient to give the court jurisdiction to issue the subpœnas, and, unless they were vacated upon proper application, the petitioner was bound to obey. Nor was it necessary that the subpœnas should "identify" themselves with the statute under which they were issued. The petitioner as a citizen of the United States was chargeable with knowledge of the law under which his attendance as a witness could be required. It was sufficient that the subpœnas required his attendance to testify on behalf of the United States at the time and place stated. Equally unavailing is the objection that after the petitioner had refused to appear in response to the subpœnas the orders to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt did not specify the offense. As the statute prescribed, he had been served with the subpœnas and had defaulted, and he had also been served with the order which directed him to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt and provided for the seizure of his property to be held to satisfy any judgment that might be rendered against him in the proceeding. The notice which he thus received was sufficient to inform him of the character of the charge against him and of the hearing at which he would have opportunity to present his defense. The petitioner also insists that the seizure which was made in case No. 200 was abandoned by virtue of the seizure of the same property under the order issued in No. 201. But the second levy was not antagonistic to the first. The proceedings were consistent.

In No. 201 the contention is made that the petitioner was subpœnaed to attend on April 2, 1928, and that the case in which his testimony was desired was not tried until April 9, 1928. There is no suggestion that the petitioner appeared on April 2, 1928, in compliance with the subpœna, and the record shows that the case in which he was subpœnaed was continued by the court until the later date. The subpœna contained the usual provision that the witness was "not to depart the court without leave of the court or district attorney." (Cf. Rev. Stat., sec. 877; U. S. C., title 28, sec. 655.) It was the duty of the petitioner to respond to the subpœna and to remain in attendance until excused by the court or by the Government's representatives.

Decrees affirmed.

Mr. Justice Roberts took no part in the consideration and decision of this case.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I merely rise to say, in connection with the information given by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] relative to the decision of the Supreme Court in the oil matter referred to by him, that a Senator and any citizen of this country would be very remiss in duty who would not take delight in giving to the Senator from Montana the principal credit for the success in the case to which he has referred. To him that credit is wholly due. We delight to certify to that conceded fact.

Spokane can take care of its own problem. Confidentially, I do not believe intent of proposers of resolution was honest. Spokane has no desire to pass the buck to National Government merely to save 1 or 2 mills additional local taxation next year. Both local tax levying bodies are in good cash position or can issue warrants or bonds. Organizations will doubtless forward counterresolutions coming week.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—ADDRESS BY SENATOR GLENN

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a radio speech by the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] on the relief of unemployment, delivered on Saturday evening, February 13.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

The issue to-night is not whether relief shall be afforded those in distress. The issue is how can such relief be most effectively and economically and soundly furnished.

No one disputes that great unemployment and dire necessity and want and suffering exist. All deplore such condition and seek to relieve it. No individual or party, or element, faction, or bloc in any party has a monopoly upon the sympathy that exists for those unfortunates who are the helpless and innocent victims of a world-wide cataclysm.

The distinguished, able, and sincere Senator from Colorado, Mr. COSTIGAN, and those who share and support his views are no more humane or sympathetic or sincere in their efforts to best meet this extreme and pressing problem than those who join with me in my attitude.

Senator COSTIGAN believes that the relief should come from the Treasury of the United States—from the Federal taxpayers; that the situation is such that it can be adequately met only in that way; that individuals, organizations, municipalities, townships, counties, and States, singly and combined, can not and will not meet this crisis; that such failure and inability are established and demonstrated; that adequate succor can be supplied only by the Federal taxpayers.

I state first:

That if I felt that America and her people were either unable or unwilling to feed the starving, relieve the suffering, or shelter the homeless except by direct appropriations from the National Treasury I would then willingly and eagerly join the Senator in his drive to take at this immediate time such money as is necessary from such Treasury for such purpose.

It is my belief that the necessity for reversing the sound and long-established procedure and methods for aiding those in want has not been established and does not in fact exist; that the local communities and the political subdivisions, the individuals, the counties, and the States are not either indisposed or powerless to cope with this emergency.

For weeks and weeks investigations of this subject have been conducted by the Committee on Manufactures of the United States Senate, by the chairman, Senator LA FOLLETTE, aided chiefly by Senator COSTIGAN, both strong and able exponents of the idea that local and State efforts have failed and that the national taxpayers must assume the responsibility and the burden from this time on.

These hearings have had great nation-wide publicity. Following the hearings, debate on the subject has continued in the Senate day after day, all widely published.

These cries of inability of communities, cities, counties, and States, these insistent and eloquent demands for the National Treasury to appropriate funds to aid the States to aid the localities where need exists have been heard and read by all the governors of the 48 States in the Union and by the members of their legislatures.

These men, elected to have authority in their 48 respective jurisdictions, have heard, dramatically portrayed by my opponent and his supporters, the supposed inability of their communities and their States to care for their own.

The stage was set for an uprising of the governors to call out to Congress, "Yes; we are helpless. Send national funds to our aid."

But the cry has not been heard.

With all the publicity and eloquence demanding this appropriation to the States, with weeks and weeks of continued hearings—ample time has been given to ascertain the attitude of the States to which the Federal funds would go—what do the States think of the movement? Do they demand, seek, require, or want the $750,000,000 which my friend would appropriate to them?

Not at all.

Only one State legislature has sent to the Senate a resolution favoring the La Follette-Costigan bill. That came from Wisconsin, whose young and popular governor, Philip La Follette, no doubt shares the views on this subject with his brother, Senator LA FOLLETTE, coauthor of the bill.

Forty-seven of the forty-eight State legislatures have failed to support the bill designed to save their constituents from dire distress.

No governor of any State, other than Wisconsin, has urged the Senate to appropriate money to aid them in this situation, and I am not certain that the Governor of Wisconsin has himself made a request of such nature. So far as I am advised, the only action taken was that of the legislature.

All must know that much of the machinery will be set up at the point where the States will come to get their funds; that the Federal Government will closely investigate and scrutinize conditions and applications and the manner of the expenditure of the funds it provides.

The relief necessary and required must be supplied and can be best supplied and administered by the localities where the need exists rather than from the far-distant seat of Government at Washington. It can be done more promptly, more effectively, more economically by neighbors and local organizations and officials than by politicians and bureaucrats in Washington.

Much time was taken before the committee by advocates of Federal appropriations in pointing out the large amount of unemployment and need in Illinois, and particularly in Chicago. It was argued that the State which I represent was powerless, helpless, prostrate before this situation; that with 600,000 to 700,000 out of employment in the second city of the country, a city whose treasury is practically without funds, in a county also unable to pay its current obligations, Chicago, Cook County, and Illinois were resourceless, and unless Federal money was promptly received, the relief funds would soon be exhausted and untold misery would result.

Certainly the easy thing, the course of least resistance, would have been for the Governor of Illinois, the General Assembly of Illinois, the county commissioners of Cook County, the mayor and the aldermen of the city of Chicago, and the citizens of Chicago and downstate Illinois, to rush to Washington with their extreme and depressing burden and responsibility, to lay it at the door of President Hoover and the National Congress, to cry out for a huge Federal appropriation, and return home, having shifted their local and State cares, duties, and obligations upon the President, the Congress, and the taxpayers of the Nation, already staggering under unprecedented demands, cares, and rapidly mounting deficits.

But Illinois did not do this. She took the opposite course. She said "These are my people. This is the function of my government. Illinois will take care of her own."

Governor Emerson called a special session of the general assembly. Downstate Illinois joined hands with Chicago to aid the suffering, to relieve want, to care for the sick and destitute, and within a few days a fund of $20,000,000 was provided for, to be established through the sale of tax-anticipation warrants which are to be redeemed by an increased gasoline tax.

The impossible was speedily accomplished, and local people in Illinois will administer Illinois funds to care for Illinois people.

Wisconsin has recently provided a fund of $8,000,000 to care for her unemployed, so I think the need there will be fully, carefully, and efficiently attended to by the brother of the coauthor of the Costigan-La Follette bill—the Governor of Wisconsin—a humane, thorough, and competent administrator.

There has been a lot of talk about the terrible suffering in the second richest State of the Union—Pennsylvania; of her utter inability to care for her people.

I discount and disparage this. Governor Pinchot has been a leader in such suggestions, but I note that in this time of terrible crisis in Pennsylvania he has been recently vacationing in the balmy Bermudas.

I do not think the Governor of Pennsylvania, who shares in a general way the progressive views of the authors of the Costigan-La Follette bill, would leave his post of duty if he really believed there was genuine danger of widespread starvation and suffering in the great Commonwealth of which he is the chief executive.

The legislatures of eight States—Kentucky, Massachusetts, Mississippi, New Jersey, New York, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Virginia—are in regular session this winter. Have they or any of them appealed to Congress for a gift or even a loan for unemployment relief? Not a single one has done so.

Special sessions have been called in five States to provide for unemployment relief—Illinois, Arizona, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, and Wisconsin. I have heretofore referred to Wisconsin. The other four made no appeal for Federal aid. Such States in which legislatures have been in session this winter represent 53,604,676 of the population of America.

Provisions for emergency unemployment relief by State legislatures this winter include—

New York	$20,000,000
Illinois	20,000,000
Pennsylvania	18,546,553
New Jersey (approximately)	10,000,000
Wisconsin	8,000,000
Rhode Island	1,500,000

The distress situation in the States other than those to which I have referred evidently has been cared for locally in a manner which has obviated the necessity for calling their legislatures into special session.

It is argued that Congress has passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill to aid banks and other financial institutions and railroads, "big business," as they say, and that, therefore, Federal aid should be afforded the unemployed, a catchy argument which will not stand analysis.

If the only purpose, the main objective of such bill, had been to help "big business," all know that it would not have received the almost unanimous support of the responsible leaders of both parties in both Houses of Congress. It would have been overwhelmingly defeated.

It was an emergency matter calculated to restore confidence, to prevent further bank failures with the great hardships they entail upon the depositors and patrons, rich and poor alike, to permit railroads with their hundreds of thousands of employees to continue to operate and to meet their pay rolls, and to aid farmers in financial distress and for other purposes equally meritorious.

It did not come until every other means of meeting the critical situation had been studied and found ineffectual. It did not come while the various States and localities of the Nation were caring for the situation with which it dealt but only after it had been thoroughly demonstrated that such efforts had failed in every section of the land.

Federal appropriations would end, to a very great extent at least, the efforts and labors of the thousands of charitable and public-spirited citizens who are working ceaselessly without pay in the various organizations for relief. It would end the community chest and like efforts. It would stop all city, county, and State appropriations. It would remove the final discretion in the apportionment of funds from close and local supervision of those who intimately know their various conditions to the seat of government at Washington. It would weaken the morale and the fiber of every individual, community, and State. It would establish another great and growing bureau at Washington with agents, investigators, and representatives going forth, at Federal expense, into every locality of the Union. It would cause delay rather than expedite action. And it would add another tremendous sum to the huge cost of the National Government.

The sum originally asked, $375,000,000, has already been doubled. It is now $750,000,000. How much, if any more, will be added to this? No one knows. No one can predict.

And remember this is only the first appropriation—the first installment. If this policy is adopted, prepare for the others that are sure to come.

This is to be added to a deficit estimated for the present fiscal year at $2,140,000,000.

This must be paid by the taxpayers of the Nation.

Let us meet this problem, this great emergency, fully, humanely, generously, sympathetically, with individual, local, municipal, county, and State resources, and save America from the great dangers which are certain to follow if local and State efforts are abandoned now and for all time hereafter; if the Nation with its Treasury is called upon to assume the functions of the States, the municipalities, and the individual citizens of the Republic.

REORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The President is hereby authorized during the session or the recess of the Congress to take action looking to a proper and scientific coordination of the work of the various executive departments of the Government, and he is hereby requested to report upon the question of transfer and consolidation of commissions, bureaus, divisions, offices, and other governmental activities, in order that duplication of service may be abolished and extravagance and unnecessary expenditures eliminated, and report with recommendations; and the report and recommendations shall be made to Congress on the first day of the regular session thereof, the first Monday in December, 1932."

Mr. McKELLAR subsequently said: Mr. President, a few minutes ago I introduced a substitute for Senate Joint Resolution 76. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government, and also the bill (S. 3771, 65th Cong., 2d sess.) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government, which was reported to the Senate for consideration from the Judiciary Committee on March 21, 1918, to be printed immediately following the joint resolution, for the information of the Senate.

Senate Joint Resolution 76 (72d Cong., 1st sess.) and Senate bill 3771 (65th Cong., 2d sess.) are as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government

Resolved, etc., That whenever the President finds that it is in the interest of the efficient exercise of the executive power and administration of the executive branch of the Government he is authorized, by Executive order—

(1) To transfer the whole or any part of any independent executive agency, and/or the functions thereof, to the jurisdiction and control of an executive department or another independent executive agency;

(2) Transfer the whole or any part of any executive agency, and/or the functions thereof, from the jurisdiction and control of one executive department to the jurisdiction and control of another executive department; or

(3) To consolidate or redistribute the functions vested in any executive department or in the executive agencies included in any executive department.

SEC. 2. The President's order directing any transfer or consolidation under the provisions of this joint resolution shall also designate the records, property (including office equipment), personnel, and unexpended balances of appropriations to be transferred.

SEC. 3. (a) All orders, rules, regulations, and permits or other privileges made, issued, or granted by or in respect of any executive agency or function transferred or consolidated with any other executive agency or function under the provisions of this joint resolution, and in effect at the time of the transfer or consolidation, shall continue in effect to the same extent as if such transfer or consolidation had not occurred, until modified, superseded, or repealed.

(b) No suit, action, or other proceeding lawfully commenced by or against the head of any department or executive agency or other officer of the United States, in his official capacity or in relation to the discharge of his official duties, shall abate by reason of any transfer of authority, powers, and duties from one officer or executive agency of the Government to another under the provisions of this joint resolution, but the court, on motion or supplemental petition filed at any time within 12 months after such transfer takes effect, showing a necessity for a survival of such suit, action, or other proceeding to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against the head of the department or executive agency or other officer of the United States to whom the authority, powers, and duties are transferred.

(c) All laws relating to any executive agency or function transferred or consolidated with any other executive agency or function under the provisions of this joint resolution shall, in so far as such laws are not inapplicable, remain in full force and effect, and shall be administered by the head of the executive agency to which the transfer is made or with which the consolidation is effected.

SEC. 4. Whenever, in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution, the President concludes that any executive department or agency should be abolished and the functions thereof transferred to another executive department or agency or eliminated entirely, he shall report his conclusions to Congress, with such recommendations as he may deem proper; and such action shall be final unless Congress, by concurrent resolution, shall disapprove it within 60 days.

SEC. 5. When used in this joint resolution—

(1) The term "executive agency" means any commission, board, bureau, division, service, or office in the executive branch of the Government, but does not include the executive departments.

(2) The term "independent executive agency" means any executive agency not under the jurisdiction or control of any executive department.

SEC. 6. The President shall report specially to Congress at the beginning of each regular session any action taken under the provisions of this joint resolution, with the reasons therefor.

(Senate bill No. 3771, 65th Cong., 2d sess.; introduced by Mr. Overman on February 6, 1918)

Be it enacted, etc., That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is hereby authorized and empowered to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary: Provided, That this act shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for one year after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time during the said year as the President may designate: Provided further, That the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act and during the time that this act is in force.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized, in such manner as he may deem most appropriate, to coordinate or consolidate any executive commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto, and to employ by Executive order any additional agency or agencies, and to vest therein the performance of such functions as he may deem appropriate.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act any moneys heretofore and hereafter appropriated for the use of any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer shall be available for the purposes for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President hereunder to perform and execute said function.

SEC. 4. That during the time this act is in force all restrictions in any existing law creating any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, or defining the duties thereof, shall be deemed to be suspended to the extent that they may be inconsistent with the exercise of the authority herein conferred.

PRINTING OF PROCEEDINGS AT UNVEILING OF STATUE OF JAMES Z. GEORGE

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 17), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed, with illustrations, and bound 5,000 copies of the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings held at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of James Z. George, presented by the State of Mississippi, of which 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 2,500 for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Mississippi.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer and shall procure suitable illustrations to be published with these proceedings.

AMERICAN COPPER PRODUCTION (S. DOC. NO. 58)

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a Senate document copious and interesting data regarding the necessity for a tariff on copper imported into the Unidte States, which data were prepared by Hon. Hoval A. Smith, of Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. VANDENBERG, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8250) granting authority to the Texas State Highway Commission to maintain and operate as constructed a free highway bridge across Trinity River, between the counties of Navarro and Henderson, in the State of Texas, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 247) thereon.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I have pending an amendment in the form of a substitute for the so-called Costigan-La Follette bill. I think it will be well to get the matter before the Senate by having the clerk read my proposed substitute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which the clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $375,000,000, to be immediately available, for allocation to the several States by the President. Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

"SEC. 2. The amounts apportioned or allocated to any State under this act shall be available for payment to and expenditure by such State, for the purposes of this act, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act.

"SEC. 3. In order to obtain payments out of the appropriations authorized in section 1 of this act a State, through its governor, shall cooperate with the President. Relief shall be administered within each State under rules and regulations adopted by the governor and approved by the President in accordance with section 4 of this act.

"SEC. 4. The governor of any State making application for funds under this act shall submit at such times as may be prescribed by the President plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within such State. The plans shall be subject to the approval of the President and shall, within the discretion of the President, include the following: (1) An estimate of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available, and of the amounts actually expended, for emergency relief by public and private agencies in the State, for the calendar years 1929, 1930, and 1931; (2) an estimate of the amounts necessary to meet the needs of emergency relief in the State in the calendar year 1932 and, upon call of the President, in the calendar year 1933; (3) provision for adequate State administrative personnel, whose qualifications to administer relief activities shall meet with the approval of the President; and (4) provision satisfactory to the President for securing the benefits contemplated by this act to persons within the State, irrespective of the period of residence within the State.

"SEC. 5. The governor of each State cooperating with the President under the provisions of this act shall make such reports concerning operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed by the President. The President may revoke any existing allotment of funds or withhold any further allotment of funds whenever he shall determine, as to any State, that the State has not properly expended or supervised the expenditure of moneys paid to it in accordance with the plans approved under this act. Before any such allotment shall be revoked or withheld from any State the President shall give notice in writing to the State stating specifically wherein the State has failed to comply with such plans.

"SEC. 6. The term 'emergency relief,' when used in this act with respect to State expenditures, means relief in the form of money or commodities furnished by the State or its civil subdivisions or by private contributions from within the State, to persons in their abode or habitation, or in shelters for the transient and homeless, or in the form of wages or other compensation for work furnished on the basis of need, and made necessary by reason of the emergency growing out of unemployment, over and above the usual and ordinary expenditures for such relief, but not including old-age pensions under special acts, or public aid under special acts to mothers for the care of dependent children, or relief to veterans under special acts; and the term 'relief,' when used in this act with respect to the allocation of funds by the President, shall be construed to include the same purposes as those included in emergency relief, and expenditures for such purposes are hereby authorized. In either case the decision of the President as to the purpose of any expenditure shall be final.

"SEC. 7. This act shall be construed as intending to secure to the several States control of the administration of this act within their respective territorial limits, subject only to the provisions and purposes of this act."

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, it will be observed from the reading of the amendment that much of its language has been copied from the bill introduced by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. I am not in disagreement with the object desired to be attained by those Senators; I am in entire sympathy with the Federal Government coming to the aid of the States wherever the States themselves have demonstrated the need. The one fault I have to find with the testimony which was taken by the Senator from Wisconsin before the Committee on Manufactures was that most of such testimony came from unofficial persons, persons engaged in the very laudable enterprise of relieving the needy, but, nevertheless, not from State public officials, at least, who have demonstrated to my satisfaction, at any rate, that they have exerted every possible effort to take care of their own unemployed. I am utterly opposed to relieving the States in this emergency until the States shall have demonstrated to the satisfaction of some recognized Federal official that their governors have exerted every effort within their means to care for the unemployed.

There is no difference between what I desire and what the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] desires, as was demonstrated in his laudable statement the other day, and what the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Colorado desire as expressed in the admirable addresses which they have delivered; but I wish to place the whole responsibility on duly elected public officials wherever Federal money is to be expended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator state in just what manner his amendment provides for a State indicating to the Federal Government that there is need of Federal assistance?

Mr. COUZENS. It is left entirely with the President; the President is the recognized public official charged with the responsibility of expending the money which is appropriated by Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is any official step to be taken by the State government?

Mr. COUZENS. The governor of any State desiring Federal assistance must apply to the President and describe the needs of his State and advise the President or the subordinate organizations operating under him to what extent the governor himself has gone to provide relief for the unemployed of his State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In other words, if I understand the Senator's position, it is this: If the officials of a State make an assertion that the burden of relief is so heavy that the State needs the assistance of the Federal Government, then the measure which the Senator advocates will become operative and the Federal Government will extend relief?

Mr. COUZENS. That is my understanding. It seems to me appropriate at this time to say that I have looked up various statements which have been made by the President from time to time, and, without the breach of any confidence, I think I may say that the President himself has stated to me on repeated occasions that he would not, under any circumstances, see the people of the United States starve. I want to quote in that connection——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Before the Senator passes to that——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will he be good enough to point out the provision in his amendment that defines the terms upon which advances of funds may be secured by a State?

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Senator from Arkansas will find what he is looking for in section 4 of my proposed substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he stated, in answer to a question by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that the governor of a State applying for funds was required to certify as to the necessity for Federal funds.

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not find in the proposed amendment the language to which the Senator refers.

Mr. COUZENS. The proposed amendment carries out the theory that the President will prescribe the rules and regulations under which the States may secure relief.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, the Senator, then, bases that conclusion on the theory that the President before making an allocation to any State would, in fact, require the governor to certify as to the necessity for Federal funds?

Mr. COUZENS. That is certainly my intention, and I think that implication is at least carried in the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not believe that the language the Senator has especially called my attention to, in answer to the question submitted to him a moment ago, warrants that implication.

I will, with the Senator's permission, read section 4 of his amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The section reads as follows:

SEC. 4. The governor of any State making application for funds under this act shall submit at such times as may be prescribed by the President plans for carrying out the provisions of this act within such State. The plans shall be subject to the approval of the President and shall, within the discretion of the President, include the following: (1) An estimate of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available and of the amounts actually expended for emergency relief by public and private agencies in the State, for the calendar years 1929, 1930, and 1931; (2) an estimate of the amounts necessary to meet the needs of emergency relief in the State in the calendar year 1932 and, upon call of the President, in the calendar year 1933; (3) provision for adequate State administrative personnel, whose qualifications to administer relief activities shall meet with the approval of the President; and (4) provision satisfactory to the President for securing the benefits contemplated by this act to persons within the State, irrespective of the period of residence within the State.

It is entirely true that the language of section 4 requires the governor of the State to supply an estimate of the amounts that have been collected from public and private sources within the State for purposes of relief and also to state the amount necessary, but there is nothing in section 4 that even implies that the State must exhaust or show that it has exhausted its resources or ability to obtain the funds found to be necessary.

Mr. COUZENS. Perhaps before I mentioned section 4 I should have drawn the Senator's attention to section 3. Nevertheless, the point the Senator makes, in my judgment, relates to an administrative matter. It certainly is not the intention of anyone, so far as I know, even in the case of the proposed Democratic substitute, to grant money from the Federal Treasury where there is no demonstration made that the States have exhausted their own funds.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is entirely true, but the language of the substitute amendment does not impose any such condition. Take section 3, to which the Senator last referred. It reads:

SEC. 3. In order to obtain payments out of the appropriations authorized in section 1 of this act, a State, through its governor, shall cooperate with the President. Relief shall be administered within each State under rules and regulations adopted by the governor and approved by the President in accordance with section 4 of this act.

Now, if I may continue for just a moment——

Mr. COUZENS. Before the Senator continues, I should like to say that if he wants to make the language any more specific, I am willing to have that done, because my intention is as I have indicated.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is not a question of making the language specific; it is not there at all, according to my interpretation.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator wants to put anything in there—and he is a lawyer and I am not—I am perfectly willing to surrender to his superior judgment as to how the language should be drawn. The intention is as I have stated; and if the amendment does not so provide, I would be glad to have the Senator propose an amendment which would carry out that intention.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator will permit me, he having generously yielded to me already, I should like to point out to him some further provisions of this proposed substitute.

Mr. COUZENS. May I complete my statement first, and then have the Senator criticize it afterwards?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well, if the Senator prefers to follow that course.

Mr. COUZENS. At the time I yielded to the Senators from Massachusetts and Arkansas I was about to point out the repeated statements of the President of the United States of his entire willingness to use Federal moneys rather than see anyone in the United States starve. He has stated, as I said before, both publicly and privately, his entire willingness to have that done.

In the New York Times of February 7, I read an article on the President in which the following was stated:

In consonance with the President's fixed policy, the program includes no Federal aid for the unemployed. He states that his emergency-relief committee reports that 44 States have signified their ability to take care of their own unemployed. If Mr. Hoover were asked, however, what he would do if local efforts proved inadequate, as in too many places they are, he would probably answer that the Federal Government could not see Americans starve. Here again; that is to say, he recognizes the coercion of circumstances. He said once that there can be no inflexible decisions in a shifting world, and if the present measures do not ease the situation, it may confidently be predicted that there will be others not excluding a dole, under whatever name it will be disguised.

I want to leave that responsibility with him. I am not convinced that the States of the United States have exerted all the efforts possible to relieve their own citizens. I can recall only three or four States that have taken definite and specific action to care for their own unemployed. I do not wish to call the roll of the States that I believe have been negligent and disregardful of their own citizens. I do not want to call the roll of the States that seem to want to "pass the buck" to the Federal Government to assume all of their responsibilities. I am not discussing this subject from a monetary standpoint. I am not interested in the amount of the appropriation, or the money needed to care for the unemployed. No one in this body is willing to go farther than I am to see that no one starves, goes improperly clothed, or unhoused. But from a long experience and contact with the administration of public welfare I am satisfied that more harm than good can be done by the careless and indifferent and unregulated giving away of money. The mere giving away of money does not solve this problem, and never will. It requires trained direction. It requires almost what we might call czaristic power, administered by a person with a heart, a person with human instincts, and yet with a complete understanding that in frequent cases more harm than good is done by the simple passing out of money.

So I do not approach this matter from the standpoint of trying to save money or trying to avoid taxation. I approach it from the standpoint that if the Federal money is to be used, however, some outstanding public official should be responsible for its administration.

I submit that the bill presented by the Senators from Wisconsin and Colorado recognizes that there must be some administrative responsibility, because, as a matter of fact, the Federal Emergency Relief Board proposed in the bill sets up the three existing public officials who are already in the administration and, I assume, under the domination of the President of the United States. It would be difficult to say that there is any administrative officer who is not subject to the control and domination of the President of the United States under any administration. So, in effect, the bill for which I offer a substitute provides that a majority of this board shall be made up of members of several bureaus. For instance, the Chief of the Children's Bureau of the Department of Labor certainly is a subordinate of the President. The director of extension work of the Department of Agriculture certainly is a subordinate of the President; and so are the other members. Even the two additional members provided in the bill to be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate will be under the domination of the President.

So why is it necessary, for a temporary situation, to create another board, with another overhead, when everybody admits that we already have too many Government employees in Washington? We have plenty of facilities. The President has plenty of facilities. The President has under his control every Government department; and while sometimes it is said that he has control of the independent commissions, I do not think that is so, but I do think he has too much influence with them at times. That, however, has nothing to do with this subject. If Federal money is used, I want to see the President of the United States responsible for its administration; and I want the head of every State to come down here to Washington and prove to the satisfaction of the President that he has exerted every possible effort to relieve his own citizens.

We gain nothing by "passing the buck." We gain nothing by relieving the governors of the several States from their responsibilities to look after unemployed. Under no conception can I reach the conclusion that government has not an absolute responsibility to look after its citizens in distress, no matter what the circumstances may be. Even if a citizen may be improvident, even if a citizen may be a bad citizen, even if a citizen may be a drunken citizen, no matter what his conditions are, government has always assumed the responsibility of looking after him, either through public welfare agencies, through poorhouses, asylums, or otherwise.

In talking the other day to a famous Britisher who was in Washington, he pointed out to me that the first charge against what they call their rates is the poor charge. In every community in England, I am informed, the first charge against taxes is the charge that the poor, the indigent, the sick, and the weak shall be taken care of. That system exists in nearly every foreign country. There is no reason on earth why it should not exist in this country. It is far preferable to make the first charge against public taxes the charge of taking care of the weak, the sick, and the indigent, and also the unemployed who are unemployed through the acts of government, either through failure to provide proper protection for industry or proper unemployment insurance or any other means that might be adopted to assure a stabilized income for those who depend upon industry.

So I am not discussing this matter from the standpoint of money. I am discussing it because I want this problem solved, and I want it started right. If this be the first time that the Federal Government undertakes to aid in the solution of the problem of unemployment and the care of the unemployed, I am anxious that it shall be started right. I do not want any mistake made. I do not want anybody to say that it is a failure. I want it to succeed; and I know of no better way of bringing that about than to place the responsibility for its success upon the governors of the several States and the President of the United States.

When it comes to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], providing $375,000,000 for road building, I express the opinion that road building is entirely overdone. The $375,000,000 given to the States for road building will not anywhere near solve the problem. It will hardly scratch the surface. The Federal Government can not raise enough money, either by taxation or by bond sales, to do enough work in road building or construction work to anywhere near take care of the unemployed.

Whatever the Government may appropriate for road building or for construction work will not take care of more than a very small portion of the unemployed, and that small portion will be made up of the most rugged, the healthiest, the strongest, and the most efficient of the unemployed. It will do very little to aid the many, many millions of unemployed who can get no direct or indirect help from construction or from road building.

Therefore, I am not submitting my substitute with any idea of getting votes from those who want roads, or of getting votes from States that think they are going to get a portion of the money; and I am not charging bad faith on the part of any proponent of the bill before us, or of the substitute. I only want to have my own views understood. Whether or not any other Senator agrees with them, I am unable to say; but I do want an opportunity of having it understood just exactly what I am in favor of, and that I want to have the policy which is about to be rejected or adopted carried out in good faith and under a responsible head. I do not believe it was possible to have done so under the establishment of an independent board, nor do I believe that the States or the unemployed will get any benefit from a mere appropriation for road building or construction work, or from loaning the States money.

Therefore, I have submitted the substitute, and I hope at the proper time we may have a roll call on it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this amendment, when analyzed, is a proposal that a lump sum of $375,000,000 be appropriated for the purposes of emergency relief, to be allocated without restriction, except as to the total amount of the appropriation, by the President. The amendment gives him the power to extend or refuse assistance upon the application of the States; to cancel or withdraw funds which, in his opinion, are not being properly expended by the States.

I find myself in sympathy with some of the declarations made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. It is exactly for the reason that most of the States, from the evidence submitted to the Senate, do not appear to have exhausted their efforts and their resources for the purposes of emergency relief that I gave support and still give support to the substitute which yesterday was rejected by the Senate. I am not sure that it is fair to the President, and I am certain that it is not quite fair to the minority, to those who are in political opposition to the President, to place in his hands a fund of $375,000,000, to give him the power to say whether he will expend any part of it, to give him the power to expend every dollar of it within a single State, to give him the power to withdraw relief tentatively granted for any reason which, in his judgment, makes that course advisable.

Mr. President, looking at this subject from a practical standpoint, it is perfectly certain that once a lump sum is appropriated, contests will arise, pressure will be exerted, and it might prove humanly impossible for the President of the United States, on the eve of a great national campaign, to take $375,000,000 of public money and expend it, or secure its expenditure, with absolute impartiality.

In saying that I make no attack on the President of the United States.

On the anniversary of Lincoln's birth there moved out of the Capitol dozens of leaders representing the administration to make public addresses, and through their addresses ran a common declaration, namely, that the President is being treated unjustly; that he is being condemned for failure to act when he ought to act, for acting when he ought to do nothing. Appeals to the sympathy of the people of the Nation were simultaneously made by these partisan speakers on a day which, by common consent, is devoted to the vitalization of patriotic impulses and sentiments. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and other Senators, and many Representatives broadcast over the radio the declaration that there is a conspiracy to malign and break down the President of the United States.

Mr. President, I declare now that the criticisms of the President's course have come in large part from adherents to the political party to which he belongs. Wholesome and fair criticism is essential to the maintenance of that spirit of independence and of progressiveness which is required to perpetuate the institutions of our country.

I doubt whether it is wise, under the conditions which now exist, to make this sum available for such distribution and application as the President or any other one man in politics desires to make.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to say to the Senator that in my substitute measure I have brought no politics into the discussion at all, and I am not finding fault with the Senator. I know the Senator does not claim that I am a very rigorous partisan. I am perfectly willing to vote with the Democrats, and always have done so when I thought they were right, and against the Republicans when I thought they were wrong. But what I wanted to point out particularly was that this substitute simply provides for an authorization, and every appropriation which can be gotten under an authorization must be approved by the Democratic Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives. I think that is quite an adequate check on what the President might get from the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have made no criticism of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. COUZENS. I know that, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It appeals to me very strongly when he, a Republican leader, declares that his reliance to safeguard the public funds is on a Democratic committee. It almost induces me to refrain from the further observations which I was about to make.

I think my colleagues will bear witness to the fact that since this session of Congress began there has been little manifestation of the spirit of partisanship. If I am wrong in that, I challenge now any Senator to take the floor and deny the correctness of the statement.

We have been told from the beginning of this session that the condition of the country is such, that business is so distressed that politics should be adjourned and emergency measures should be advanced by common consent. That is exactly what has been done. Some measures which many of us on this side of the Chamber have doubted received support; others which we favored have also been enacted; and others which we initiated have been brought forward. Yet every day some Republican orator, apparently spokesman for the administration, tells the country that Mr. Hoover has saved the United States and is saving mankind.

A distinguished partisan speaker, a lady of national renown, is reputed to have told the public, in addresses reported by the press, that there is no such thing existing as a panic or depression, that depression has all vanished before the magic wand of the President, like mist before a rising sun. Here we are, in the midst of a time of great stress and strain, abating political activities and deferring political discussion. A Senator with no such thought in his mind has proposed to appropriate $375,000,000 for the President to do exactly what he pleases with; and I do not feel that it will be really helpful if such a course be acquiesced in or taken by the legislative department of the Government.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Listening to the remarks of the Senator reminds me that the difference between the substitute and the original bill is that under the substitute now offered certain powers are given directly to the President in words, including the power to veto all appointments of people in the States administering charity, and that under the original bill power is indirectly given to the President, through a bureau, which, of course, as the Senator stated, is necessarily subordinate to the Chief Executive, and they can give the assistance to a State or withhold it at will. So that in effect the net result is the same, after all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Undoubtedly. The Senator from Michigan made the point against the original bill, but apparently is unable to see the point when it is directed at his own amendment.

I have not said, and I shall not say, that the President is not trained and skilled in the direction of matters pertaining to relief. I have not said, and I shall not say, that he would deliberately abuse the power which is proposed so generously and needlessly, from my viewpoint, to be conferred upon him by the pending amendment. But I do say, and I shall repeat, that it would be extraordinary and that it is not to be expected, if $375,000,000 should be granted as proposed, that it would be disbursed without some measure of discrimination and partiality. It might be impossible to avoid that even if the methods resorted to in the substitute were adopted; but it is entirely too much to say that the President of the United States, who insists there is no occasion for emergency relief, that there never has been, and that none is in immediate prospect, shall have $375,000,000 to give to a governor if he wishes, to deny it to a governor if the President desires, to withdraw it from a governor if the action of the governor or the State agencies displeases him, to allot to one governor, since the terms of the amendment permit, the entire fund if he desires to do so.

Of course, it is not necessary and it is not possible to undertake to determine what will be done with the $375,000,000 if the amendment of the Senator from Michigan should be agreed to. The President will be given by the Congress the power to employ it or not to employ it, to use it as he pleases. I think it is the worst proposition respecting the method of distribution that has been submitted.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, in the light of what the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has just said I think it would be quite appropriate to have read at the desk a statement by Paul Y. Anderson appearing in the Nation of February 17, 1932, because the Senator's speech shows a reversal on some of the things which are indicated in that article.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Nation, February 17, 1932]

MR. HOOVER RIDES THE DONKEY

By Paul Y. Anderson

WASHINGTON, February 6.—President Hoover finally has found a party he can control. In a burst of that fine chivalry which impels them irresistibly to espouse causes which are both lost and discredited, the Democrats in Congress have hastily enacted most of the Hoover proposals and confirmed nearly all the Hoover appointees, and now they are valiantly opposing what Hoover calls the "dole." To be perfectly consistent they should also support him for reelection. "Dole," it should be explained, is a term colloquially employed to define a Federal appropriation for relieving starvation in the United States. It does not apply to Federal appropriations for relieving starvation in Belgium, Germany, Serbia, Poland, Russia, and points east—that comes under the head of "American altruism." It does not apply to Federal appropriations for relieving hungry banks, railroads, insurance companies, or farm cooperatives—these are "constructive measures." Nor does it cover municipal, county, State, or private relief funds—they are in the noble category of "local self-help."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I wanted this read because it shows what not only Republican leaders and politicians are saying about the Democrats who are going along with the Hoover program, but what an independent newspaper writer is saying about it. For my part I am indeed delighted that the Democratic leader has decided that it is time the Democrats quit being used by the President and his followers for political purposes in this country.

I was interested in what the Senator from Arkansas said about speeches made on Lincoln's birthday. I do not object so much to the fact that Lincoln's birthday was used as a time in which to make political speeches as I do that the Republicans appeal to the country to glorify the President, because he has had the united support of both Democrats and Republicans in this emergency in enacting legislation which the President has asked to help stop the panic. There is a good reason why the Democrats did not propose and attempt to put through the Congress legislation differing from that which the President demanded on the subjects covered. That reason is that if in good faith they had done so, the bills would have been vetoed when they reached the White House, and upon the Democrats would fall the charge that they were responsible for a continuation of the panic and unemployment.

Not having sufficient votes to override the President's veto, with a great emergency confronting the country, with millions of men out of work, with banks closing their doors in every community in America, with people by the millions wondering how they are going to live through the rest of the winter, then in this emergency when the Democrats allow the President's measures to pass, and in fact help to pass them, that fact is used as an argument to prove that the Hoover policies are right and that the Democrats have no plan, that the Democrats can not offer anything in the emergency. I say it is about time that the country should realize that when the Democrats of the House and Senate try to be patriotic in a situation like this, they are then abused and accused of not having the ability or the courage or the initiative to propose a plan in such an emergency.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I think it is a question whether or not they can say that the Democrats are patriotic when they are following blindly the President of the United States in this emergency.

Mr. DILL. It is not said that the Democrats are patriotic. It is said that the Democrats are unable to offer anything else and that the plans of the President must be good because the Democrats have voted for them. The truth of the matter is that I think the time has come when the Democrats ought to assert themselves, and I believe they will assert themselves.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. DILL. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I wonder whether the Republicans have not given the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] all the credit for the banking legislation which has been proposed. Certainly he is a good Democrat.

Mr. DILL. Yes; they are giving the Senator from Virginia credit for the banking legislation, and they are talking about it as being a part of Mr. Hoover's relief program in the form of getting more money into circulation throughout the country.

But what is the result of the bill of the Senator from Virginia having been reported? The stock market is being manipulated in New York, and stocks are being boosted 10 or 15 points a day by a few riggers of stock-exchange prices. Millions of dollars will be lost in the next few days as a result. They did the same thing when the moratorium was proposed. They boosted stock prices and tried to make the people of the country think that prosperity had come back, and then the stocks dropped to a lower point than they had reached at any other time. They did the same thing when the corporation credit plan was organized by the President. They boosted the stocks and said, "This means that prosperity has returned," and then stock prices went down again. They did the same thing when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was passed.

I believe that the Glass banking bill has some excellent things in it, and I remind the Senator from Michigan and the country that the best provisions of that bill, if they really help the country, are Democratic provisions introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. He introduced a bill providing that Government bonds might be used as a basis for the issuance of paper currency by the Secretary of the Treasury. Mr. Mellon attacked it and said the country did not need any more money, and opposed the bill. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has put that plan in his bill, and the administration claims credit for having put forward a measure that will put more money into circulation in the country.

I believe the country will realize after a while that, if there is to be anything constructive done for the common people of America, it will have to come from other sources than the White House, because everything that has been presented by the President and approved by the Congress as a measure of constructive help to the country has proved a failure and conditions have grown worse, more banks have gone broke, more men are out of employment, and still we are told that the President is a great leader because the Democrats vote with him and have not anything better to offer than the President himself has offered.

To my mind, the bill before us now is illustrative of the pitiful spectacle in which the United States Senate finds itself. Undoubtedly a majority of the Members of the Senate are in favor of all necessary appropriations to feed the hungry, to clothe and provide shelter for those in desperate need. But we have gotten into a political contest here and we are fighting over technical questions, and unless every sign fails, we are not going to pass any legislation on the subject.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] worked out a bill which they think is good. There are certain things in it with which many of the Democrats disagree. The Democrats have brought forward a substitute. What happens? The only serious difference between the two proposals is that the bill originally proposed would have the money distributed by a Federal bureau. The Democratic substitute proposed to have it distributed through the States. The Democrats insist that this money shall be repaid either directly by the States or taken out of Federal appropriations for highways in the next five years. What happens when it comes to a vote? The Senators who introduced the bill, and who have stood here and pleaded with us and told us of the terrible need in the country, unite with regular Republicans who are against all kinds of relief, and the few Democrats who are against all kinds of relief, and in that way beat the substitute. Now, when we come to a final vote on the bill of Senator LA FOLLETTE, the same crowd of Republicans and a large percentage of the Democrats who are opposed to the Federal bureau idea, will unite and the substitute will be beaten and we will have nothing for the men who are hungry and poor, and all because we do not agree on some technicality.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the Senator mean a technicality as to whether the relief shall come from the Federal Government out of taxes upon large incomes and inheritances, or whether it is to be thrown over upon the States to be raised by taxes on real property?

Mr. DILL. That is not the issue at all, because it is provided in the bill, and the Senator knows it, that if the States do not repay the amount received it will be taken from Federal appropriations made in the future for Federal aid to highways. There is not any issue at all about that. The issue is whether or not we are going to do this through a Federal bureau in Washington or whether we are going to do it through the States, whether it is to be given to the people in the States, or whether it is to be later returned by being held out of future appropriations from the Federal Treasury for Federal aid to highways.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly; and in the last analysis if it is held out of the future Federal appropriations for Federal aid to highways, it means that the burden which the Federal Government has been carrying will be thrown over on the real and tangible property in the States which already carry a staggering load of taxes greater than they should carry.

Mr. DILL. If that happens it will be in the years to come. What we need is relief now. I think it ill becomes the Senator from Wisconsin, who has been so lengthy and so vivid in his description of the terrible need for this fund, to stand and fight about a technicality which he now puts upon the basis of some taxes to be levied in the years to come, when the panic will be past.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If I may say it, I am greatly shocked to find the Senator from Washington trying to create a haven of refuge for the big income-tax payers.

Mr. DILL. The Senator, of course, gets away from the issue, which is whether or not we are going to feed the people who are hungry. We can fight out the other question afterwards. The Senator knows I have always voted and I shall continue to vote for just as big income taxes as he can possibly favor. I have always voted and always will vote that way, but I remind the Senator that the policies being pursued here are going to result in no legislation, in the appropriation of no money at all for those people who are hungry.

I voted for the Democratic substitute yesterday because I think it is the better plan. I am going to vote for the Senator's bill when I get an opportunity. I am going to vote for anything here that will furnish money for those people who are hungry. I do not believe that in a free American country we can afford to fight over technicalities in such a crisis. I do not care about the technicalities so far as I am concerned. I do not care to the extent of voting against the bill whether the distribution of funds is to be made by a Federal bureau or by the States. I prefer to have it done by the States; but if I can not have my way, I am willing to sink my differences in order that we may get some money so that we may not have food riots in this country.

It is easy enough to say we have not had food riots. It is easy enough to say that there will not be any food riots; but the record of the hearings which the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Colorado conducted shows that we are coming to the point where the local resources are becoming exhausted. Cities are bankrupt; they have exhausted their taxing power; they have contributed all the resources that they can. Yet we stand here and manipulate ourselves into a position over technical differences whereby there will not be any money for people who are suffering and in distress, when the local resources are completely exhausted or soon will be exhausted.

For my part, I do not think it ought to be a partisan question at all. While I have my opinions and my convictions on certain policies and principles of government, I have had to sink them completely in the Senate in voting for legislation for which I have already voted at this session; and I am willing to sink them now, because this is an emergency; this is a time when men should be big enough to rise above parties, quit squabbling about partisanship, and vote and act in the interest of millions of needy people of this country and of the institutions of which we are so proud and which we hope to maintain for the generations that shall follow us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is absent for the moment. Does the Senator from Wisconsin desire to speak at this time?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I understood the Senator from Michigan desired a record vote on his amendment.

Mr. McNARY. As we have reached that point, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

NOT VOTING—12

Bulow	Howell	Metcalf	Shortridge

So the amendment of Mr. COUZENS in the nature of a substitute was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered an amendment proposing to broaden the authorizations of the pending bill. At that time I made a statement in explanation of the amendment. I desire to have a record vote on the amendment; but before the vote is taken I desire to complete the record by placing in the record some supporting data.

At this point I ask that the amendment, as proposed on yesterday, be printed at length in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield for that purpose?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment:

Strike out section 2 of Title I and section 1 of Title II, and insert in lieu of section 2 of Title I, the following:

"SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $1,000,000,000, to be immediately available, for purposes as follows:

"(a) Such sums as may be necessary in carrying into effect the provisions under Title I not exceeding $375,000,000 for allocation to the several States by the Federal Emergency Relief Board created by section 3 in the manner hereinafter provided. Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

"(b) Such sums as may be necessary in carrying into effect the provisions under Title II not exceeding $375,000,000 for the purpose of the construction and reconstruction of highways under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented. Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000 thereof shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

"(c) The sum of $250,000,000 for carrying into effect the provisions under Title III for initiating and developing the program of public construction work set forth in the report of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, entitled 'Preliminary Report of 6-Year Federal Planning Program for Construction, Repairs, and Alterations' and dated January 20, 1932: Provided, That any unused portion of funds authorized under (a) and (b) may be appropriated and used in carrying into effect the provisions under Title III and such sums shall be in addition to the allocation in this subdivision (c).

"TITLE III

"SECTION 1. The President, the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the construction agencies as defined in the Federal employment stabilization act (46 Stat. 1084) are severally requested to exercise the authority conferred upon them by said act to the end that supplemental estimates of public-works emergency appropriations in an amount as provided in subdivision (c) of section 2 of Title I may at the earliest possible time be transmitted to Congress pursuant to such act so that an emergency public-works program may be inaugurated and the policy of Congress declared in such act may be effectuated."

Amend section 2 of Title II as follows: First, change section 2 to read "Section 1"; second, in line 15, page 13, change said line to read: "ization contained in subdivision (b) of section 2 of Title I shall, from time to."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the amendment as read pertains only to the authorizing section. It does not in any sense change the present Costigan-La Follette bill; but I contend that the authorization in that bill is not sufficiently extensive to bring about any substantial benefit. It provides for this year but the sum of $125,000,000. If the bill should pass, and the Congress should appropriate all the money that it can appropriate under the bill, only $125,000,000 would be available until the 30th day of June. The best records we have show that there are 8,000,000 unemployed to-day. Assuming that each one of the unemployed will get his share, we find that each unemployed person would receive only the sum of $15.50 to tide him over through the next four and a half months. Then the Norris amendment of $375,000,000 makes available for the construction of roads only $125,000,000 for this year. The same facts would pertain under the Norris amendment. If each of the 8,000,000 unemployed received a proportionate share, he would receive only the sum of $15.50. I hold that that is entirely inadequate. The amendment proposed by me increases the authorization so that a program of public works may be undertaken.

My amendment proposes to carry out existing law. Last winter we passed through the Congress a bill which was signed by the President on February 10, 1931, known as Public, No. 616, Seventy-first Congress. This act was sponsored by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. At this time I ask that a copy of this act be incorporated in the RECORD, but I shall not ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[PUBLIC—No. 616—SEVENTY-FIRST CONGRESS]
[S. 5776]

An act to provide for the advance planning and regulated construction of public works, for the stabilization of industry, and for aiding in the prevention of unemployment during periods of business depression

FEDERAL EMPLOYMENT STABILIZATION BOARD

SEC. 3. It shall be the duty of the board to advise the President from time to time of the trend of employment and business activity and of the existence or approach of periods of business depression and unemployment in the United States or in any substantial portion thereof; to cooperate with the construction agencies in formulating methods of advance planning; to make progress reports; and to perform the other functions assigned to it by this act.

(b) The board is authorized to appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws, a director and such experts, and clerical and other assistants, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of Government and elsewhere, for law books, books of reference, and periodicals) as may be necessary for the administration of this act, and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time. The compensation of the director and such experts and clerical and other assistants shall be fixed in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended. (b) The board may also take into consideration the index of employment prepared by the Department of Labor, and any other information concerning employment furnished the Department of Labor or by any other public or private agency, and any other facts which it may consider pertinent.

PUBLIC WORKS EMERGENCY APPROPRIATION

SEC. 5. Whenever, upon recommendation of the board, the President finds that there exists, or that within the six months next following there is likely to exist, in the United States or any substantial portion thereof, a period of business depression and unemployment, he is requested to transmit to the Congress by special message, at such time and from time to time thereafter, such supplemental estimates as he deems advisable for emergency appropriations, to be expended during such period upon authorized construction in order to aid in preventing unemployment and permit the Government to avail itself of the opportunity for speedy, efficient, and economical construction during any such period. Except as provided in this act, such supplemental estimates shall conform to the provisions of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921.

WORKS ON WHICH APPROPRIATION USED

SEC. 6. Such emergency appropriations are authorized and shall be expended only—

(a) For carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, as now or hereafter amended and supplemented;

(b) For the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and for the prosecution of such projects heretofore and hereafter authorized as may be most desirable in the interest of commerce and navigation;

(c) For prosecuting flood-control projects heretofore or hereafter authorized; and

(d) For carrying into effect the provisions of the public buildings act, approved May 25, 1926, as now or hereafter amended and supplemented, in respect of public buildings within and without the District of Columbia.

(e) For prosecuting such other construction as may now or hereafter be authorized by the Congress and which is or may be included in the 6-year advance plans, as hereinafter provided.

ACCELERATION OF EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION

SEC. 7. For the purpose of aiding in the prevention of unemployment during periods of business depression and of permitting the Government to avail itself of opportunity for speedy, efficient, and economical construction during such periods the President may direct the construction agencies to accelerate during such periods, to such extent as is deemed practicable, the prosecution of all authorized construction within their control.

ADVANCE PLANNING

SEC. 8. (a) It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to arrange the construction of public works so far as practicable in such manner as will assist in the stabilization of industry and employment through the proper timing of such construction, and that to further this object there shall be advance planning, including preparation of detailed construction plans, of public works by the construction agencies and the board.

(b) Each head of a department or independent establishment having jurisdiction over one or more construction agencies shall direct each such construction agency to prepare a 6-year advance plan, with estimates showing projects allotted to each year. Such estimates shall show separately the estimated cost of land, the estimated cost of new construction, and the estimated annual cost of operation and of repairs and alterations.

(c) Each construction agency shall also prepare a program for prompt commencement and carrying out of an expanded program at any time. This program shall include organization plans. It shall also include the plans for the acquisition of sites and the preparation of advance detailed construction plans for not less than one year in advance, except where in the judgment of the board this would not be practicable.

(d) Such programs, plans, and estimates for the 6-year period shall be submitted to the board and to the Director of the Bureau of the Budget. The Director of the Bureau of the Budget shall report to the President from time to time consolidated plans and estimates.

(e) Each construction agency shall keep its 6-year plan up to date by an annual revision of the plans and estimates for the unexpired years and by annually extending the plan and estimates for an additional year.

(f) The President is requested each year before recommending the amount of construction appropriations for the next fiscal year to take into consideration the volume of construction in the United States, the state of employment, and the activity of general business.

(g) The board shall collect information concerning advance construction plans and estimates by States, municipalities, and other public and private agencies which may indicate the probable volume of construction within the United States or which may aid the construction agencies in formulating their advance plans.

Approved, February 10, 1931.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, the law passed last winter provided that a board should be created to make a survey, the report of such survey to be available at times like these, when a depression is on. This board has made the survey. The report is now pending upon the desk of the Presiding Officer; or, rather, I happen to have it on my desk. I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the report.

This report was submitted in pursuance of existing law. It embraces three volumes. I have here this large roll, the report submitted by the Secretary of War. It embraces the things the War Department now wants. It covers projects that have been surveyed and are now ready to be constructed in the following States:

Alabama, Alaska Territory, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Ohio, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Texas, Tennessee, Utah, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, Wyoming, and our possessions of Hawaii, Panama, the Philippine Islands, and Porto Rico.

This report is complete, containing the desires of the War Department; and if this authorization should pass, here is a report ready to be considered. It would place it in the power of the War Department to submit estimates; and the moment those estimates were submitted and the appropriations made the work outlined here that the War Department wants could be commenced immediately. Some of the work is ready to be commenced in 2 days' time, some in a week, some in 2 weeks, some in 30 days, and some in 3 months.

I desire now to call briefly to the attention of the Senate some of the things that this report covers.

Here are two more volumes, comprising several hundred pages. Here is an extract showing the kinds of work that this report recommends shall be done. Each item in this report has been recorded at the request of the several departments of the Government.

We have first the Department of Agriculture, including improvements, buildings, extensions, and repairs for the Biological Survey, the Bureau of Dairy Industry, the Forest Service, the Bureau of Plant Industry, and the Bureau of Public Roads.

Then we have the Department of Commerce, desiring improvements, construction, repairs, and extensions covering fisheries, lighthouses, and mines.

The Interior Department: Items for Howard University, construction items, Indian Affairs, National Park Service, Reclamation, St. Elizabeths Hospital.

Department of Justice: Prisons.

Labor Department: Immigration.

Navy Department: Yards and Docks, $25,000,000; plans made, estimates desired; and my amendment simply gives the authorization and places the responsibility where it belongs.

Congress can not construct buildings. Congress can not build roads. All we can do is to make the authorizations first, and then the appropriations. The work must be done by the executive branch of the Government. The executive branch, however, can not function until we first pass the authorization bills, and then follow the authorization bills with the appropriations. My amendment proposes to make the authorizations. Then, when the money is authorized, if the administration, through its Budget Bureau, is unwilling to ask for the money, we can not be blamed. My amendment seeks to place the responsibility where, in my judgment, it belongs.

The Post Office Department desires money for public buildings; the State Department for Foreign Service buildings; the Treasury Department for the Coast Guard, Federal office buildings, and the Public Health Service. I am simply giving a list of the departments asking for money for building purposes, for construction purposes, for repair purposes, for extension purposes.

Corps of Engineers: For Alaska, flood control, rivers and harbors.

Militia Bureau.

Independent offices.

Here are requests they are making:

The Architect of the Capitol is asking for money.

The Arlington Memorial Bridge is asking for money.

The George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial is asking for money.

The inland waterways are asking for money.

The Mount Rushmore Memorial, the Panama Canal, public buildings and public parks, the Smithsonian Institution are asking for money. The Veterans' Administration is asking for $20,000,000 to construct buildings and hospitals to take care of the disabled soldiers of the land.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator will recall that the interdepartmental committee, having to do with the construction of post offices and other public buildings, has recommended a number of buildings in various States, but there has been no authorization for those buildings and no appropriation made for their construction. They have already passed the test and it has been recommended that the buildings be constructed, but Congress has not yet authorized their construction or made appropriations for their construction. Why should they not do that?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. This amendment, if adopted by the Congress, will be an authorization. My amendment is predicated upon this identical report which I have upon my desk, and which I have exhibited to the Senate. If this amendment should be adopted by the Congress, then the departments of the Government, through the Budget Bureau, can send to the Congress estimates of the money necessary to build the buildings which, in their judgment, should be built first. I am not trying to dictate to the departments what they shall build first.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator's amendment contemplates, then, the buildings which have already been approved by the interdepartmental committee?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Entirely so. I am asking for nothing new. I am asking for no wild expenditure of money to give people work just to give them work. I am asking that the Government do the things which the departments want done, and I hold that the doing of those things would not only secure the buildings and improvements but get them now, and it will cost less money than it would at some time in the future. While we are getting the buildings, we will be getting that thing which we are standing on this floor demanding—the opportunity to work for the millions of unemployed of the country.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. In the most sympathetic manner possible, and with no thought at all of throwing cold water on this project, because I am in sympathy with it, I do wish to know how the Senator would finance the carrying out of the projects.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad the Senator asked that question.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oklahoma permit me to give my idea on this in response to the question of the able Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the State of Oklahoma is one of the fortunate States in the persons of her two Senators. The able senior Senator is now presenting an amendment which I believe addresses itself to the sound discretion of this body, and I shall support it. Only last Friday the able junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] asked a question about as follows: "Where will we get the money with which to administer this relief and pay for these public improvements?"

Mr. President, I make no pretensions to being an authority on finance, but the suggestion I now make is one that is sound. It is one which has been approved by the leading financiers. It is as follows:

Whilst disclaiming an attempt here to find fault with the previous Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, for his rapid retirement of the public debt during the past decade, financiers, taxpayers, and economists in America now realize that it is unwise, unsound, unjust, and unfair to continue to retire the public debt at the same ratio at which we have been retiring that debt during the past 10 years. To provide that the public debt hereafter, or at least during the next few years, shall be retired only at the rate of 40 per cent annually of the amount at which it has been retired heretofore will release available money, to wit, several hundred millions of dollars annually, which will easily provide for all the appropriations authorized in this bill or in the various relief bills which we have proposed.

Mr. President, I am amazed that the gentlemen throughout our country, on various political sides, who are running around the country like tortured animals on a hot surface trying to find some issue they can lay before the public, have not suggested that if elected President they will adopt the policy of hereafter retiring the public debt at not above one-half or 40 per cent of the figure per year at which it is being retired. Such plan of 40 per cent reduction annually has the approval of sound bankers; it has the approval of the former Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo; and it will have the approval of every man who thinks into things instead of around things.

I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will pardon me for this interruption. He could have given a better reply, but I desired that this reply should be made.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Arizona. He has added much to this discussion.

Answering further the inquiry of the Senator from New York, let me make this statement. Under the Constitution, revenue measures must originate in the House of Representatives. It has been held by many, and by the House of Representatives itself many times, that a bill proposing a method of financing public improvements, or what not, should not originate in the Senate.

Just a few days ago we had before this body a bill proposing a $2,000,000,000 appropriation for the benefit of big business, which had in it the element of bonds. We passed the bill first and sent it to the other House, and they turned down the Senate bill and substituted their own bill in its stead, for the reason that they held that the Senate had no right to provide for raising money by a bond issue.

Every time the Senate has passed a bill proposing to raise money through a bond issue, and has sent it to the other House, they have killed the bill, or substituted one of their own for it. They hold over there that the Senate is without power constitutionally to raise money, either by taxation or through a bond issue.

For that reason I did not see fit, in my substitute, to concern myself at this time with the raising of money. I want to say to the distinguished Senator from New York that I have no hesitancy in going on record here in favor of $1,000,000,000 of bonds to cover this public-building program, or $2,000,000,000 in bonds, or $3,000,000,000, if it takes that much. We must get the money through a bond issue, it is true. We can not raise it by taxation. But I contend that raising money by a bond issue now will have one effect, which I favor, and that is to bring down the purchasing power of the dollar. It will cheapen the dollar, and if two billions of bonds will cheapen the dollar more, bring the dollar down further, it will add to the prices of the products of my section of the country, the products of the farm. It will double the price of wheat, it will double the price of corn, it will double the price of oil, it will double the price of cotton, and if we can add one or two billion dollars to the total debt of the Nation with the effect of doubling the income of the people, it will have the identical effect of reducing the existing bonds one-half. If by adding a billion or two billions to the total debt we can thereby reduce the value of the dollar, then such a policy would have the effect of decreasing all bonded indebtedness, decreasing taxes and reducing salaries.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to add a sentence to the statement I made a moment ago?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I stated that financiers, bankers, experts, economists, and many other persons have considered the subject of retiring the public debt at a less rapid pace. I omitted to state, and I now do so, that after an investigation of six months I am convinced that 90 per cent of the bondholders themselves are not only content but are willing and anxious that the bonds of the United States should not be retired at such a rapid pace as that at which they have been retired heretofore. I am on this point making no criticism of the previous Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon. It was a noble ambition he had, rapidly to retire the United States bonds; he lived up to it well, and at the time he acted to reduce the debt we could retire the same at the proportion at which he attempted to retire it. Therefore no criticism is even implied against him on this subject. But I repeat with added emphasis that at this particular time it is preposterous for any Secretary of the Treasury to believe that he could safely retire the public debt at the same ratio annually as that followed heretofore.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senator that at this time we are borrowing money to pay the salaries of our public officials. If we can borrow money to pay the salaries of the Members of the Senate and our other public officials, I see no added disadvantage in borrowing money to pay wages to the unemployed.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would like to be permitted, even in parenthesis, to make a suggestion which it seems to me ultimately will have to be taken up in a more extended presentation—yet one which solves the difficulties suggested by both the Senator from Oklahoma and the Senator from Arizona.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a well-known opinion, has as its text the doctrine that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." We can not provide as these different bills propose, and hope to have the money that they suggest, except by an increased general taxation.

This country has become taxed to its fullest extent of capacity to pay. To levy additional taxation is to confiscate the resources which the citizens may have and through which they might put to work the millions of unemployed in the respective factories and industries of America.

Therefore, Mr. President, we have reached the point when a new order and a new system of finance must be taken up to obtain as a new policy in America. The idea suggested now and then that the mere increase of taxation expressed in a bill will produce money is a myth; a theme indulged for the consolation of the hopeful. Sir, if there be no resources or sources from which to collect those taxes, the mere declaration of the intent to levy them in the bills will procure no revenue but only disappoint.

Hence we have reached the point when this country should declare a bonded issue by which we can refund all the debt of the United States owing to-day and send the bonds for sale to the world, where they may be taken up by those who have money in other countries as well as by those who have money in secret recesses of hoarding, as is alluded to by the Senator from Oklahoma, but these bonds must be made payable in great part by other generations than the present living.

The present generation should not be called on to pay the whole debt of the World War, and all the debts which have followed from it, including these proposed reliefs expressed in the bills and amendments now pending. Steps should be promptly taken to float a bond issue large enough to comprehend all the immediate needs of our country, and pass the collection to future generations, on the theory that those who fought the war and bore its burdens and expense during the conflict should not now be compelled wholly to pay all obligations following from it, but those who shall inherit its benefits in the coming generations should be those who should proportionately pay for it.

Therefore, both the Senator from Oklahoma, and the Senator from Arizona have my complete approval in their suggestion of a bond issue, to which I add the suggestion of a complete policy of payments for the future.

Therefore I go farther, and propose that the bonds be paid by coming generations, and that the present generation be exempt from increase of the burden of taxation which is now rapidly resulting in both the appropriation of all their present proceeds and the confiscation of all their future.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I thank the Senator for his statement.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PATTERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have just made a hasty list of the appropriations which have come before this Congress. There is one of $203,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator mean requests for appropriations?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; some of the bills have been passed, and the others are pending and will pass.

Two hundred and three million dollars was appropriated in the deficiency bill for veterans' relief. One hundred and twenty-six million dollars was appropriated in the general deficiency bill.

A $125,000,000 appropriation was authorized in the farm bank bill.

Five hundred million dollars was appropriated and authorized in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Fifteen hundred million dollars was provided in an enlargement of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Four billion six hundred and one million dollars was included in the Budget message submitted by the President.

There is a $2,000,000,000 deficit.

The total at this very moment before the Congress, to be provided for either now or through a bond issue subsequently, or to remain in the form of a deficit, is $9,055,000,000.

It is stated that the present tax laws will raise about $2,500,000,000. That leaves six billion five hundred and fifty million unprovided for, which must either be taken care of through a bond issue or by an increase in taxes over and above the income of the Government from existing tax laws.

That is equivalent, in a country of 120,000,000 people, to $54 per capita, or about $200 a family, so far obligated in this session of Congress.

I therefore feel that any measure to take care of the unemployed, any relief measure, should be devoted to governmental needs first.

I therefore shall support the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma in so far as it applies to such governmental needs, because these are normal Federal activities that we would carry on anyhow in the course of time. I think the amendment dealing with these needs is scaled down to a figure or scaled up to a figure, according to the way we wish to look at it, which is as high as we can go, considering our financial condition at the moment. But as things now stand, the Congress has to bring in a tax bill sooner or later to provide about $75 per capita to take care of the expenditures up to the present moment over and above that which will be raised by existing tax laws. Every man of good sense knows that sooner or later taxes, if these appropriations keep on, are going to become so burdensome that they will destroy the very purpose for which the money was originally appropriated.

I therefore feel that in so far as the Senator from Oklahoma deals in a construction bill designed primarily to take care of governmental needs which will have to be taken care of eventually anyway, and makes his appropriation reasonable, it has merit.

In view of the huge tax problem presented to the Congress we should begin to ask where the money is coming from and we should spend money only for governmental needs, and that in a rational and not a too spendthrift manner. I do not mean to say that if the States and the local communities finally break down—they have not broken down yet, but if they do finally break down and the people are starving to death—we will not have to tighten up our belts and approprite in the hope that another day will come when we can pay off the obligations we have created. I believe the thing that will help the unemployed more than anything else now is to conduct the Government upon an economical basis, as far as we can do it with due regard to present business conditions.

I shall support, if opportunity presents, that part of the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma which, I feel, is sound in policy and constrained in the amount of the expenditures it proposes.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I thank the Senator for his suggestion and proffer of support. A few moments ago, when the last amendment was voted upon and received such scant consideration, I was only sure of one vote for my own proposal.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. I can assure the Senator that his amendment will have another vote.

To touch upon the subject raised by the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], may I read some figures which I used when I addressed the Senate on January 15 on the general subject which is being discussed by the Senator from Oklahoma? Those figures show that between 1920 and 1930 the United States Government collected in taxes $3,459,512,000 more than was necessary for the operation of the Government, including the statutory requirements for the national debt. It seems to me that if we had earmarked those surpluses as a reserve to be used for construction work in such an emergency as we now have, we could use them for that purpose. It seems to me we can still in effect earmark them by enlarging our Federal debt at this time to meet just such a public construction program.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I likewise thank the Senator from New York for his statement.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield.

Mr. COPELAND. When we were interrupted in our colloquy by the wise remarks of the Senator from Arizona [Mr.

ASHURST], I had asked the Senator how he was going to get the money. Frankly I do not think his answer was quite complete.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Through a bond issue, I will say to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator said that the raising of money is the business of the House and he now says it would be done by a bond issue. Has the Senator thought along this line? We have pending in a current bill an appropriation for permanent improvements of $377,000,000.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The report I have changes that slightly and gives the amount as $419,000,000. I am going to make this a part of the record shortly.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well; $419,000,000. Besides that, there are appropriations already made and available until expended enough probably to make a total of $500,000,000 when added to the $419,000,000. Assuming that the La Follette-Costigan bill were to pass without the road-construction feature, that would add $375,000,000, so we would have a total of $875,000,000 before we come to the question of permanent improvements, such as suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma. As a matter of fact, we would need to provide this year, if the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma were to be adopted, about $2,000,000,000, which would be counted as "capital investment."

If a railroad company were to build a new roadbed, extend its lines, and erect new stations, those expenditures would not be charged against the current budget. They would be charged to capital investment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think at this point I should make clear just what I am asking for. I am demanding that we start upon the program embraced in the three volumes to which I have referred. The total amount of that program is $1,051,000,000. Of that sum $30,000,000 is authorized and appropriated. The Budget is asking for $419,000,000 for public improvements covered by that program. Adding the $419,000,000 and $30,000,000 and subtracting the total the $449,000,000 from the total amount of the program leaves approximately $550,000,000 unauthorized and of course unappropriated. That is all my proposal contemplates.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say once more that I am speaking in deepest sympathy with the Senator's proposal. But we face the fact nevertheless, even though we do not originate the legislation, that we of the Senate have to share with the House the responsibility for providing means to pay the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I only meant a while ago that we were estopped from suggesting ways of raising money. Were it within our power, I would have included an item in the bill suggesting some way to do it; but being without such authority, I did not see fit even to suggest it.

Mr. COPELAND. Perhaps the Senator would not take it amiss if I were to suggest a plan which it seems to me might accomplish what the Senator has in mind, though of course it would have to originate in the House.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I would be very glad to have the Senator suggest it.

Mr. COPELAND. I agree very fully with the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and others who have spoken about the haste with which the public debt was retired. I think we went altogether too fast.

Seven or eight years ago I offered in the Senate a proposal for advanced planning in order that we might in times of prosperity have arrangements made for taking care of times of depression. It received no consideration, because Senators on the other side of the Chamber were so sure that the political millennium had arrived and that prosperity would continue forever that they had no interest in the bill.

We are facing an entirely different situation to-day. We will be shocked and horrified when the returns come in on the 15th of March, in my opinion. The revenue we will get from income taxes for the last year will be tremendously less than we anticipate; so we can not hope, except by a bond issue, to do the things contemplated by the Senator and others who have in mind these activities.

Why could we not do this? Why could we not have a bond issue and then have a method of retirement through a manufacturer's tax, such as is spoken of in the House, having a very limited prosperity tax, the use of which would be exclusively applied to the retirement of bonds put out for permanent improvements authorized to overcome unemployment?

I know perfectly well the American Federation of Labor and all other labor groups would seriously object to a sales tax as a means of providing funds for the current expenses of the Government. But I can not conceive how any employed person in this country could object to the imposition of a tax which was to be applied exclusively to the retirement of bonds issued to give employment.

That is the thing I have in mind. I believe it might be possible to embark on a wise plan of public construction without actually going out and attempting to sell the bonds. I frankly say to the Senator that in addition to the bonds we have already proposed and those which will be needed to take care of the deficit, I doubt exceedingly if it will be possible to float the bonds for this proposal.

It would not be necessary to do that if there were some method of retirement. A bond issue could be authorized and those bonds left in the portfolio of the Treasury. Currency could be issued against them with the proviso that out of the returns from a manufacturer's tax should come revenue to be used exclusively for the one purpose of the retirement of those particular bonds. That is a matter which I have discussed with many who are competent to pass judgment on the plan. There is no such thing in it as the inflation of the currency to any undesirable degree. There is no such thing in it as "fiat money." It is the use of funds for a specific purpose, the retirement of the bonds issued to be provided by a special tax.

If that could be done, I think the plan of the Senator's could be carried out in spite of the incredulous attitude of many. It would be financially possible to put in effect exactly what the Senator has in mind.

Unless we do find some means to give relief to the unemployed, we do not know what may be the end in America. I do not think that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] have at all overdrawn the situation in this country to-day. There must be found a means of relief. If there could be found a way to finance the plan proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma, there would be in it all the good he claims for it. Then there would be the relief of the unemployed to the extent that he dreams of in connection with his very proper proposal.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I certainly thank the Senator from New York for his contribution to this discussion. I have yielded twice now, and I have encouragement that I will get two votes in support of my amendment. I wish to say that I shall be glad to yield to other Senators as I proceed.

Mr. President, unless this amendment shall prevail, there will be no authorization; if the amendment shall prevail and the bill shall be passed, it will only be an authorization. We must have an appropriation following before there will be any obligation direct or incurred, and if the bill shall pass and an appropriation shall be made necessary to raise the money, we can take up the bond-issue feature at a later date. However, I want to observe just here that we are now borrowing money to run the Government; we are borrowing money to pay the salary of the President; we are borrowing money to pay the salary of each Cabinet official; we are borrowing money now, Mr. President, to pay the salaries of the hundreds of thousands of employees of the Government; we are borrowing money to pay the salaries of the Members of this House and the Members of the other House of Congress. If it be a wise practice to borrow money to pay the salaries of Members upon this floor and of public officials, why is it not equally as good a policy to consider at least a proposal to borrow money and scatter it out among the unemployed of the country—the folk who are really in need?

Mr. President, while I am on that proposal, I desire to say that we recently passed a bill authorizing $500,000,000 to be appropriated to be loaned to industry. The moment that bill became a law authorizing the appropriations, the Congress promptly made the appropriation. In order that it may be made available, we must raise the money in some way, and at the present time the only way that I can see of raising it is through a bond issue.

How is that money to be spent, Mr. President? I hold in my hand an Associated Press dispatch telling about the first loan made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I desire to read just how that money is being spent—money for which we shall have to issue bonds, in all probability.

FIRST LOAN MADE BY FINANCE FUND—WABASH RAILROAD GETS AID OF RECONSTRUCTION CORPORATION

The first of the huge fund to be fed into credit channels by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation last night was on its way, with the bankrupt Wabash Railroad and banks the recipients.

The corporation announced the loan to the receivers of the railroad for the purpose of paying the principal and interest of equipment-trust certificates of the company, now in arrears and maturing prior to June 1.

It was also said loans had been made and others authorized to a number of banks in various sections of the country.

ST. LOUIS, February 13.—The Wabash Railway Co., which applied for a loan of $18,500,000 from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, has been advanced $7,100,000 by the Federal agency, Nat S. Brown, general counsel for the receivers, announced tonight. Application for the balance of the loan remains on file, he said.

Mr. President, if that statement be correct—and I think it is—we are now borrowing money to loan to the railroads, including a railroad now in the hands of receivers, and to banks already failed, and banks, I fear, that are doomed to failure. If it be good policy to borrow money, on bonds it may be, to loan to defunct railroads and to failed banks and to banks about to close, how can anyone say it is a bad policy to borrow a few dollars to afford relief to those now so sorely in distress?

The only reason I am offering my amendment is because of a conviction that the La Follette-Costigan bill is not sufficient. It makes available only $125,000,000 for the remainder of this year for 8,000,000 unemployed. Dividing that sum equally means $15.50 per person. We know, as a practical proposition, that the average man is a man of family and that the average family consists of five persons. With $15.50 per family from now to the 1st of July, some four months and a half, and with five to the family, make the division and see what a pitiful sum it is proposed to provide for the relief of those in distress. Then, conceding for the sake of the argument that the Norris amendment shall prevail—and it is now a part of the bill—it only makes an additional $125,000,000 available, or another $15.50 per family to the working people of the country between now and the 1st of July.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Oklahoma state just what his amendment proposes to strike out of the pending bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It proposes to strike out nothing from the Costigan-La Follette bill and nothing from the Norris amendment; it accepts them as they are; but it adds $250,000,000 more to start the program of which the administration apparently is in favor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It accepts the administration of the relief by a Federal bureau? Is that correct?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I make no change in the aspect of the Costigan-La Follette bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It also accepts the direct relief proposed by the Costigan-La Follette bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. It does, with this modification in effect or in substance: If my proposal should be adopted, I hope it will take care of many for whom the La Follette-Costigan bill may provide in the way of a dole—they can be taken care of through work. I think it is better for people to give them work than it is to give them a dole.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator calls it a "dole," but he leaves what he calls a "dole" in the bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I do; but I propose to minimize it by furnishing those in need with work instead of giving them money.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is, the Senator assumes that there will not be so much of a demand upon the Federal Treasury for this money because of the employment for which he provides in other parts of the bill? Is that correct?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma retains the appropriation provided for work relief that is contained in the Costigan-La Follette bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. There is no change whatever in that respect.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand further, that the Senator's amendment also contains the provisions of the so-called Norris amendment to the Costigan-La Follette bill.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. There is no change whatever in that regard.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And in addition to that the Senator provides for an increased appropriation of how much?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. For an additional appropriation of $250,000,000, making a total of $1,000,000,000 authorized.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Massachusetts asked a question which, if I understood him correctly, was in my mind. The authorization will amount to $1,000,000,000 in case the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma shall be adopted.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is correct.

Mr. BORAH. In other words, it includes the $375,000,000 authorization in the original Costigan-La Follette bill, the $375,000,000 authorization which was placed in the bill by the Norris amendment——

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That comes out of the billion-dollar authorization.

Mr. BORAH. And $250,000,000 which the Senator provides, making a total of about a billion dollars?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. An even billion dollars, with the proviso that any sum appropriated under the Costigan-La Follette authorization and not used and that any sum appropriated under the Norris amendment and not used may be used to carry out further the program authorized by my proposal, and that program involves an ultimate expenditure of a billion dollars. However, I am not asking for the full amount to carry out the program.

At this point I desire to offer for the RECORD the statement from which I read earlier, giving an analysis of the report submitted by the Federal Employment Stabilization Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, some one may suggest that if this proposal should be adopted, the unemployed could not get quick benefits from it. I desire to read from the record. Here is volume No. 1 of the report submitted to the Congress by the commission. The report states how soon the departments can begin work in the event the money should be provided. I read from page 8:

It would take three months to start work under that project; as to the next item, it would take one month; as to the next item, work could start at once; as to the next item, it could start in two weeks; as to the next item, it could start at once. "Two weeks, at once, at once," and so on down the line—"at once, 1 week, 2 weeks, 30 days, 3 months."

If this authorization shall be agreed to and the departments submit their estimate and we appropriate the money, the plans are ready to commence work at once, and we can provide the money, allocate the funds to all the States, and put the unemployed to work earning money with which they can support themselves as quickly as it can be distributed under the gratuities as provided by the Costigan-La Follette proposal.

Mr. President, I think I have made my position clear. I submit the amendment and ask for a record vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], on which he asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I express the hope the Senator from Oklahoma may be given a record vote on his amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire at this time to state my position upon the pending relief proposals.

Mr. President, that there is a solemn obligation on the part of society to relieve want and suffering, poverty and destitution, all civilized people unreservedly recognize. Charity is a natural law implanted by the Almighty in the hearts of men. Every religion has espoused this creed. The Founder of Christianity has declared that the greatest of all the virtues is charity. It is an obligation supernaturally imposed upon those who are blessed with the comforts of life and an accumulation of worldly resources beyond their reasonable necessities to share their possessions with the poor.

At a time like the present, when the army of unemployed has greatly increased the number of our citizens who are without the necessities of life through no fault of their own, the obligation to alleviate the lot of their fellow beings who are in want, is more than a human command—it is a divine precept.

Democratic governments are organized to promote the public welfare. Surely there is no duty included in the expression, "the promotion of the public welfare," more imperative than to remove the evil consequences, the suffering, diseases, death itself, that are concomitant with human beings underfed, underclothed, and unsheltered. Under our form of government we have placed this primary duty upon each local community—upon the group of citizens who have politically incorporated themselves for the purpose of establishing local self-government where immediate and direct opportunity is had to provide the people in want with the frugal comforts of life. Under our system of government, if the local political unit fails, this obligation shifts to the State, for the local community exists by authority of the State. The State government is supreme in its control of the wants and needs of the individual citizens within its borders. It can not excuse itself if any of its subdivisions fail to perform its delegated obligations. This is why the terms State rights, State control, local self-government, democracy, mean so much and are cherished so dearly.

In the light of these principles if the local or county communities are failing to meet adequately the obligations enforced upon them by present distressing conditions, or if they are unable to continue to sustain the tax burdens of local relief, then, indeed, it is the duty and responsibility of the State to assume the burden. But I submit it is not the duty or responsibility of the Federal Government to embark on any such enterprise until such time as the States themselves have contributed to local emergency relief and until they have exhausted their own resources. There is no evidence before us that they have exhausted their resources. Indeed, there are only a few States that have as yet even initiated the policy it is now proposed the Federal Government should embark upon.

Until that situation arises how can we justify reaching into the Federal Treasury in order to have the Federal Government share in this fundamental State and local government function?

The States possess the same powers of taxation as the Federal Government; indeed, they have avenues of taxation that the Federal Government does not possess. The per capita cost for the support of the several State governments is far less than that for the Federal Government. It was for all the States $15 per capita when figures were last available; for the National Government $135 per capita. The per capita net debt of Ohio is only $1.43; of Indiana, 77 cents; of Wisconsin, 47 cents; of Georgia, $2.50; of Kentucky, 77 cents; of Oklahoma, 81 cents; of Texas, 75 cents; of Massachusetts, $4.06; of Connecticut, 78 cents; of Pennsylvania, $8.50. Do these figures indicate such a bankrupt state of the several State governments that they can not furnish adequate relief to their distressed citizens?

Many States, like the great States of Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio, New Jersey, Illinois, Connecticut, and California, have no income tax law. These States should not expect aid from the Federal Treasury through taxes collected from the citizens of States that pay both Federal and State income taxes until such States have placed like tax burdens upon their citizens. Only 15 States, including Massachusetts, have a personal-income tax that corresponds to the Federal income tax.

Is any Senator willing to indict or permit his State to be indicted by alleging that it has refused or intends to refuse to appropriate the necessary money to relieve want and suffering within its own borders? Is the Senate's position that, by coercion or force, through a trifling Federal appropriation to each State, we will compel the officials of our State governments who forsooth are not as humane as we, to do their duty not only as servants of the people but as Christians?

I know what your answer will be to what I am saying. It was what I myself thought and believed one year ago, namely, that the Federal Treasury, receiving large taxes from the wealthy income taxpayers, should contribute something toward this emergency relief. Indeed, in 1930 I presented a bill for Federal relief based, however, upon an entirely different theory of distribution and on the theory that only a temporary emergency then existed. But what changed conditions exist to-day? A year ago the tremendous shrinkage in Federal revenues was not apparent. We could have borrowed money at 1½ per cent last year. The depression then seemed temporary; to-day it is at least semipermanent. The Federal Government at present has a rapidly rising deficit reaching appalling and threatening proportions. The Federal income continues to decrease monthly; a new tax bill is being drafted which will increase income taxes tremendously upon large incomes, as it should. But, I venture to say, no tax on incomes that this Congress will adopt can possibly provide sufficient money to balance the Government's Budget. To-day many of the recent rich income-tax payers are close to the bread lines.

In my judgment, in addition to very high income taxes, we may be forced into the adoption of a general sales tax in order to pay the ordinary running expenses of the Federal Government. This means that the expenses of the Government, more than ever, will have to come out of the pockets of the average man and woman.

Yet I would waive all this and mortgage the future by a generous contribution from the Federal Government for direct relief if I were assured that the depression was temporary; if it would be over in 18 months; if this appropriation would only be for once, and if what we are doing by passing this bill would not indicate a permanent obligation upon the Federal Government to participate in permanent direct relief work throughout the Nation.

Mr. President, who dares, in the light of what has transpired in the last two and one-half years, to claim that there is to be a sudden revival of prosperity in this country? Who will question the assertion that at the present time we may not be far from what will be normal conditions during the next 5 or 10 years? What prospect is there of an immediate return of our lost export business? What evidence is there of any appreciable increase in the purchasing power of the American consumer this month, next month, or 12 months from now? Frankly, I see no future prosperity to mortgage. I see no immediate end to this new Federal undertaking if the National Government now decides to take away from the States their obligations to raise the funds to take care of those in want. I refuse to take this step now, which I consider an abandonment of the theory that we are a Union of States rather than a union of 120,000,000 people. It is the final blow to the sovereignty of the State governments if the Federal Government established the policy of giving direct relief before the several States have done or even attempted to give relief to their people in distress.

Mr. President, the financial exactions of this measure may add to the very situation we are trying to alleviate. In the midst of this gloom and depression the credit of the Government itself is seriously impaired. No government in all history that has not been able to balance its budget has ever been able to turn depression into prosperity. I have reached the conclusion that the greatest service we can render the unemployed and the business interests of our country and those who look forward hopefully to better days is to balance without delay the Budget of the Federal Government. That means two immediate steps. The first, to stop new demands on the Federal Treasury and then to cut all governmental expenses by the elimination of extravagance, luxuries, and waste; in a word, retrenchment and economy. The second step is the passage of a tax bill, no matter to what extremes it may be necessary to go, that will provide an income sufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. In my judgment, this is the road to business revival, increase in employment, and a lessening demand on the States and municipalities for welfare expenditures.

If we now put new and larger demands on the Treasury, the tax bill which will be necessary would itself become a source of discouragement rather than encouragement to progress in business, industry, and commerce. Whatever will affect the destinies of the industries and commerce of the country will affect the destinies of the millions whose earnings as employees and whose incomes as stockholders constitute the economic background of the country. We can not find employment for all through the Federal Treasury. By the course we pursue now we will vitally affect the interests of the tens of millions of people directly and indirectly dependent upon the recovery and continuance of the business of the country. Continuing increases in Government expenditures and a serious decline in governmental income will never break the back of this depression.

For these reasons I can not support the pending measure, although my sympathies prompt me to do it regardless of the many objectionable details concerning the distribution and control of the proposed funds that are incorporated in these bills. The bureaucracy features of this bill are alone indefensible.

I do declare that I am ready to support any proposal made to lend the credit of the Federal Government to obtain all funds for needed relief in any State in the Union when and where a State is unable to obtain credit.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. My friend the Senator from Massachusetts knows that no one in this body entertains more respect for him or holds him in higher regard than myself. Therefore, no question which I shall address to him is to be considered as offered in a critical spirit.

I ask in earnestness, for I do not know, whether the Senator, in line with his political philosophy, has been opposed in the past and is now opposed to Federal grants in aid of the States; for example, in the construction of public roads?

May I say, in connection with the question, that the suggestion that the States should exhaust their resources before application is made to the Federal Government has not been adopted in what are known as our State aid acts? We have proceeded on the theory in those acts, and the measure pending before this body was so drafted, that it is desirable in the national interest at times for the States and the Federal Government to cooperate.

May I also add, so that the Senator will have all the implications of my question, that no State more than Massachusetts, which he represents here with distinction, has in the past more imperatively insisted on the duty of the States to give first place to the national welfare?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think the Senator is correct in his assertion that the statesmen of Massachusetts who represented that State in the Federal Government prior to the Civil War may not always have been strong adherents to the doctrine of State rights. I think that a review of the history of the statesmen of my State during the time prior to the Civil War, and perhaps since, would disclose a great many of them advocating doctrines not in accord with the democratic idea of State rights. I suppose that is why the statesmen of my State were so strongly opposed to the movement in the South for a strict construction of the doctrine of State rights.

As to the question of my attitude toward Federal undertakings which require cooperation upon the part of the States with the Federal Treasury, I would say that I have been opposed to appropriations for highway purposes which require a contribution from the National Treasury to be matched with a contribution from the treasuries of the several States. If I had been a Member of the Congress in the early days of the movement for good roads, I might have favored Federal aid for a limited period on a more equitable basis than is now in vogue. I think the movement, as I understand it, was inaugurated in 1913 with a strict limitation of five years. Five years was to be the beginning and the end of Federal and State cooperation in the building of public roads. But that, like every other new bureau and every other movement of the kind, has gone on and on and is to-day a fixed policy. I was surprised to read the other day that when the first bureau for the construction of public roads began it was in a small office with a few employees. To-day there are thousands of Government employees engaged in this work, among them over 500 being engineers.

Let me say that I personally think we have gone to extremes in road building. I personally think my own State may be making public roads a luxury. There are to-day in my State three magnificent boulevards extending from the city of Worcester to the city of Boston, a distance of 40 miles, one of them just being built at an enormous cost, permitting four lanes of travel over each of the highways. It is my honest judgment, in view of conditions, in view of the tax situation, that my State could have dispensed with one of these highways. I think that even Senators from the sparsely settled States who have been troubled with the highway problem and who have benefited greatly by Federal cooperation—and I am glad they have—will agree that we must at some time reach a point where the continued building of highways is going to result in being necessarily considered a luxury and an extravagance. I think there is a point to which we can go where the overhead will become so great for maintaining these roads that it will impose a confiscatory tax burden upon our people. I think we are approaching extravagance in this field as in many other activities of the Government. It was natural to become careless and extravagant just as private industry did during the boom era. Private industry is now prostrate and been obliged to eliminate its luxuries and extravagances. In my judgment, the Federal, State, and local Governments also must do so, and without delay, if we are to move out of this terrible business slump.

I hope I have answered the Senator's inquiry and I want to say that I appreciate his cordial references to me. I am sorry I differ with him because I know this bill is a matter to which he has given conscientious and devoted service. I compliment him and his associate the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] in calling the attention of the country to the situation. Even if we are not able to agree as to the methods of relief I am sure the very agitation and discussion of it here will arouse the municipalities and the State governments, whose obligation it is, to a realization of their solemn duty to take care of the needed relief in their jurisdictions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, at this point I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD the bill (S. 5043) to reimburse the States and their political subdivisions for certain relief expenditures, introduced in the Seventy-first Congress, first session, by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the Chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, for the relief of the several States and political subdivisions thereof, as a reimbursement or contribution in aid from the United States, induced by the extraordinary conditions of necessity and emergency resulting from the serious financial burden of caring for distressed persons residing in such States and political subdivisions.

SEC. 2. Any State desiring to participate in the benefits of this act shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the total amounts expended each month during 1929, 1930, and 1931 for the purpose of relieving the unemployed, including the aged and sick, by such State and its political subdivisions.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of the Treasury shall distribute the sum herein appropriated on a monthly basis, allotting to each State which certifies an expenditure for any one month of 1930 and 1931 of a greater sum than such State and all its political subdivisions expended for the same month in 1929, an amount equal to 50 per centum of the amount of the average of the monthly expenditures of such State for 1929. The first payment hereunder shall include the sums payable for each month from January 1, 1930, to the date of the approval of this act.

SEC. 4. The proper authorities of each State shall distribute monthly on a pro rata basis any sums received under authority of this act to the State and each political subdivision thereof whose expenditures for relief purposes were included in the certified statement of expenditures to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I think it is regrettable that those who have been sponsoring both of the bills have not been able to get together so that there would be assurance that some legislation with reference to the unemployment situation might be enacted. There is no doubt in my mind that a majority of the Members of this body are in favor of some kind of legislation, but various excuses have been offered as to why they could not support this bill and some other bill. For my part, I voted first for the substitute, although I am frank to say to the Senate that it was not in my judgment as suitable to meet the situation as is the present bill.

However that may be, as to the arguments that have been advanced as to why we should not grant Federal relief, it seems to me that none have taken into consideration the question of who is responsible for present economic conditions in the country. I venture the assertion that no man will rise on the floor of the Senate and assert for one moment that the city authorities in any city in the United States are responsible for the unemployment in that community. I venture the further assertion that no one will rise on the floor of the Senate and assert that the State authorities and the State governments are responsible for the economic conditions in any particular State. If that is a true statement, then they are not responsible, and the responsibility rests upon the Federal Government.

What excuse can there be for some one rising on the floor of the Senate and saying, "You must go back to your city government; you must go back to your State government; you must not come to the Federal Government for relief, notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Government is responsible for present conditions." The Democrats in this Chamber and the Democratic Party are going into the next campaign and say to the country that the economic distress in the country is caused, not by any State, not by the mayor of any city, not by any city council, not by the governor of any State. They are going to say that the present economic condition in the country is brought about by the Republican Party.

But how are they going to answer the question that will be asked as to why we would not take care of the unemployed, the men and women who have been thrown out of employment when the Republican Party and the administration in Washington have been responsible for the condition of affairs that exist? There can be no question as to who is responsible for the economic conditions in the country. There is hardly a man on this side of the Chamber but what will say that one of the things that has brought about not only the national but the international complications which have arisen has been the tariff question. There is not a man on the floor of the Senate but what will say likewise that one of the things responsible for present economic conditions and distress is the inflation that was permitted during the years from 1925 to 1929 by the Federal reserve bank and the deflation which followed in its wake. There is no Senator on this side of the Chamber who knows anything about the subject at all but what will say the speculation in Wall Street was responsible in large part for existing economic conditions and not the various city and State governments.

Mr. President, we find it is said that we are not going to vote for this piece of legislation because of the fact that while it is admitted that there is distress, while it is admitted that it is going to get worse, yet some Senators say that the Government of the United States should do nothing about it. This morning the leader on this side of the Chamber said that the Republican Party is going out and lauding Mr. Hoover and giving him credit because of the fact that he was able to put across certain legislation. I think the Republicans are entitled to give him credit because of the fact that he has been able to get both Democrats and Republicans to follow his lead in the enactment of legislation. Think of the spectacle that took place just the other day in the House. There was a bill involving the very structure of our whole financial system introduced and referred to committees of the Senate and House, and in just a day or two passed with practically no consideration at all by either the committee or the Members of the House or by the committee of the Senate.

I am not afraid of the criticism that is made of Democrats on the ground that Members on this side of the Chamber have been too partisan. I think that the country is criticising the Members on this side of the Chamber because of the fact that we have not been partisan enough and because of the fact that we are just following the dictation of the leader of the Republican Party at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. I think they have a right to criticize the Democratic Party because of the fact that we have followed blindly his leadership. It is true that he wired to Members of the Senate and House who were not familiar with conditions that existed and asked them to line up for the moratorium. They lined up for it and then voted for it.

Then he came before us with a finance bill and called little groups together. International bankers came down and got little groups together. They said "You have got to pass this bill and you must not even discuss it." Democrats put it through for them, and what did it provide? It means going into the Treasury of the Federal Government and taking the people's money and loaning it to the railroads and the bankers of the country. It means the Government going into business. Yet, when many of the cities have said they are unable to take care of the unemployed in their various localities, when for weeks and months we heard testimony showing the suffering and conditions that exist in the country, men who have given no study to it, who have given no thought to the subject, some Senators stand here and say it is not necessary for the Federal Government to do this, that there is no suffering in the country, and that if there is the Government of the United States should not act to relieve it until the city or the State has exhausted all its resources.

I would say for the city of New York or the city of Chicago or the city of Helena or the city of Butte or any other city, if it was responsible for bringing about existing economic conditions and the resultant unemployment in the community, then, of course, it should take care of the situation and should exhaust all its resources before coming to the Congress of the United States. But when there is not a man upon the floor of the Senate who will challenge the statement that no city in the United States, no State government in the United States, is responsible for the unemployment that exists but it has been entirely due to economic conditions brought about by the policies of the Federal Government, then where is the logic in saying to those who are unemployed, "Go back home and let your city"—which is already in debt and which had no responsibility in bringing about the condition—"first exhaust its resources before you appeal to the Federal Government"; or in saying to the States, which had no responsibility in bringing it about, "You must exhaust your resources before you can appeal to the Federal Government"?

Mr. President, when some great corporation comes here, when, if you please, the leading international bankers, when the gamblers and speculators in Wall Street come here and say, by reason of the economic situation in this country, some bank in their section or some bank here or some great railroad there is going into receivership, Mr. President, what do we do? We do not say to that railroad in the city of New York or the State of New York, "Go back to your city government in the city of New York, go back to the State of New York; let them exhaust the resources of the city or of the State before you come to the Federal Government and ask the National Government to take money out of the Treasury of the United States to render assistance." Oh, Mr. President, on the one hand we have the man in the street who is trying to get work and the woman walking the streets seeking employment, and, on the other hand, we have the men who put up the campaign funds for the great political parties in the Nation; that is the difference.

Let me say to Senators upon this side of the Chamber as well as to those upon the other side that when I am appealing to you now to vote for this measure I am appealing to you because if conditions grow worse, as one of the largest manufacturers and industrialists of this country said to me, instead of having 8,000,000 people out of employment next year, we will have 18,000,000 out of employment.

If that be true, Mr. President, then we had better appropriate some money out of the Federal Treasury to help feed the hungry and those who are out of employment through no fault of their own. I say we had better do it, Mr. President, because it is wise to do it if we wish to preserve the institutions of the country. I am in favor of preserving those institutions, and I am appealing to the Senate because I want to see them preserved. In my humble judgment, those who are standing here and because of some technicality are saying, "We are not going to vote for the bill," are doing a great disservice to their own Government and their own country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a second?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. In order to have a chance to secure a record vote, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], on which he demands the yeas and nays. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I understand, if present, he would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I am at liberty to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). Making the same announcement regarding my pair as on the previous roll call, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I understand, however, if he were present he would vote as I expect to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. FESS (when the name of Mr. MOSES was called). I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. Were he present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce that, if present, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] on this question would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; and

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] are detained from the Senate on official business.

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is not the question divisible under Rule XVIII of the Rules of the Senate? The bill as it now stands consists of two parts—title 1 and title 2—neither of which is in any wise related to the other.

The rule reads:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that on the final passage?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. On the final passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator read the rule again?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The bill, as I have stated, consists of two entirely independent parts—title 1 and title 2. The question now before the Senate, as I understand, is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?

The rule reads:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided.

If it is in order to do so, I shall ask that the question be divided so that the vote will be taken separately upon title 1 and title 2.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that on the final passage of a bill no separate vote can be had.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Will the Chair indicate how he reaches that conclusion under the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That question could be raised on amendments which have been proposed; but the bill having been read the third time, the question now is, Shall the bill pass? That is put as one question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me that if the rule means anything at all, it means that if a question consists of two parts, the vote shall be taken separately upon each of them upon the demand of any Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me perfectly plain that the rule the Senator has read does not apply to the passage of a bill. If it did, just think for a moment where it would lead us.

Take a tariff bill containing all kinds of titles, all kinds of subjects. On the passage of the bill it would have all these various items in it. If we had before us an amendment to a bill that had separate subjects included in it, there would be a reason for the rule; and I think that is what the rule means and what it was made for. When we come to the final passage of a bill, however, if the Senator's contention is correct, 99 per cent of the bills that we pass here could be separated, and we could have a dozen votes on each of them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I ask the Senator if he can give us an instance of a case to which he thinks the rule does apply?

Mr. NORRIS. Any amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that is not the rule. It does not say any amendment may be divided. It says "any question."

Mr. NORRIS. The rules do say what the question shall be: Shall the bill pass?

Take a tariff bill. It contains various titles. Nobody has ever suggested for a moment that when we come to the final passage of a bill separate votes may be had on the various titles.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. Here is an amendment proposed that has three propositions in it. The question is, Shall the amendment be adopted? And any Senator has an opportunity to divide the question into three propositions.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be true if we had an amendment before us, but that is not the question before us now. We have gone through with all that. We have put them all together. We have made out of them a bill, and to go back to that would be to go back to the beginning and commence all over again.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I would suggest that perhaps the title of Rule XVIII is relevant in this inquiry. The title, as the Senator will see, deals only with amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the question now before the Senate is not divisible.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I offer the amendment which I send to the desk in the nature of a substitute for the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time will be reconsidered for the purpose of permitting the amendment to be offered. The Senator from Montana offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Montana offers the following amendment in the nature of a substitute:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $375,000,000 (one-third of which shall be immediately available) for the purpose of the construction and reconstruction of highways under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented. Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000, authorized in this section, shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

"SEC. 2. The sums appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in section 1 shall, from time to time, be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture among the several States in the manner provided by section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended, and shall be available for expenditure upon highway projects approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, in the same manner as other funds appropriated for carrying out the provisions of such act; except that no part of such amounts apportioned to any State need be matched by State funds, but the same may be used to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds required on Federal-aid projects, and except that in the expenditure of such sum the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities of 2,500 or more population and upon the payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds shall not apply. The work on highways shall be done in such manner as to use the maximum amount of human labor consistent with economy, and preference in employment shall be given to the unemployed. When the Secretary of Agriculture finds that any highway project approved by him in any State has been constructed or reconstructed in compliance with the plans and specifications relating thereto, he shall cause to be paid the proper authorities of the State, out of amounts appropriated pursuant to this act, an amount equal to the total cost of such project, and may, in his discretion, from time to time make such payments on such construction or reconstruction as the same progresses; but the total amount so paid to the State shall not exceed the amount apportioned to that State as hereinbefore provided: Provided, That of the sum authorized to be appropriated by section 1 hereof, it shall be discretionary with the Secretary of Agriculture, from time to time, to apportion not to exceed $9,000,000 in accordance with the provisions of the second paragraph of section 3 of the Federal highway act, as amended June 24, 1930, and to expend the sum so apportioned in accordance therewith; he also may, in his discretion, from time to time, apportion not to exceed the sum of $37,500,000 for carrying out the provisions of section 23 of the Federal highway act, as amended and supplemented."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it will be observed that this proposes, as a substitute for the pending bill, the road-construction program which was a feature of both the original substitute and the pending bill, made a part of it upon the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. From a reading of the proposed substitute, I judge it is the same that is already in the bill under title 2. Is that correct?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the effect of the Senator's substitute, so called, is to strike from the pending bill title 1?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Practically so; yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). I repeat the announcement I have made as to my pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I am informed that if present that Senator would vote as I desire to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous roll call, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. I understand, however, that that Senator would vote as I expect to vote, so I am liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; and

The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I find that I can transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and I do so and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 58, as follows:

So the substitute proposed by Mr. WALSH of Montana was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move to recommit the pending bill to the Committee on Manufactures, with instructions to report back a bill based on the report and recommendation of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Florida offers the following amendment, on page 12, after section 13, to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 14. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $150,000,000, to be immediately available, for carrying into effect the provisions for initiating and developing the program of public construction work set forth in the report of the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, entitled "Preliminary Report of Six-Year Federal Planning Program for Construction, Repairs, and Alterations" and dated January 20, 1932.

The President, the Federal Employment Stabilization Board, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, and the construction agencies as defined in the Federal employment stabilization act (46 Stat. 1084) are severally requested to exercise the authority conferred upon them by said act to the end that supplemental estimates of public works emergency appropriations in an amount as provided herein may at the earliest possible time be transmitted to Congress pursuant to such act so that an emergency public-works program may be inaugurated and the policy of Congress declared in such act may be effectuated.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I want to make a brief statement with regard to this proposed amendment.

The amendment is taken from the substitute which was proposed by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS], it being only a part of his substitute. His substitute, it will be recalled, dealt with a number of different items of appropriations. This amendment deals only with the question of the construction program.

Now we are insisting upon making provisions for taking care of the unemployed of the country, and I think that purpose is a very commendable one and reflects credit on those who have been laboring in this behalf. But how can we more directly be of assistance toward the relief of unemployment than by providing a construction program, so that many of those adapted to this character of work will be given employment, and the Government will get value received for their employment?

This plan, under the so-called Wagner bill, which was passed at the last session, has been reported upon by the stabilization board, certain public works have been suggested, and this amendment provides for $150,000,000 to make a beginning upon that construction program.

If the idea is to assist the unemployed and to relieve distress in this country, I can not see any method which would be more advantageous than one that is covered by this amendment, which, as I have before stated, was taken from the proposal of the Senator from Oklahoma, except that the amount has been reduced to $150,000,000 from $250,000,000.

I wish to aid in alleviating the distress of the people throughout the country, but I do not believe we ought to make a gift to a person unless it is absolutely essential to save him from suffering for want of food, for want of shelter, or for want of raiment.

If we could provide for employment, why not adopt that as at least one of the methods to contribute toward relieving the situation, which I admit, in many sections is very distressing.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Do I understand the Senator is asking for $150,000,000 in addition to the $375,000,000 provided in the bill?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The bill provides $375,000,000 for Federal highway construction and building of streets in municipalities. This is an additional $150,000,000 for construction along the line of public buildings and public improvements and possibly in some instances river and harbor projects.

Mr. COPELAND. It does not displace the human relief portion of the bill?

Mr. TRAMMELL. This is in addition to and independent of that portion of the bill. I first mentioned this to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] because I did not wish to propose it if he desired to do so. I have suggested the amendment so we can vote upon this issue alone; that is, whether or not we are willing to make an additional appropriation of $150,000,000 to stimulate and increase and enlarge construction work throughout the country. That is all that is involved in the question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I did not hear all of the Senator's remarks. Can the Senator point out what work has been reported by the commission?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not recall all the details. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] has all the details. I would not attempt to inflict the Senate with a reading of them or worry myself to read them all.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does it include river and harbor work already authorized?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think perhaps the Senator from Oklahoma can answer the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Reading from volume 1, to which I have previously referred, I find for the Agricultural Department $246,000,000 with which to do construction work; Department of Commerce, $300,000,000; Interior Department, $200,000,000; Department of Justice, $4,000,000; Department of Labor, $71,000; Navy Department, $25,000,000; Post Office Department, $16,000,000; State Department, including Foreign Service construction, $1,000,000; Treasury Department, $13,000,000; War Department, $420,000,000 for housing; independent offices, $58,000,000; municipal government for the District of Columbia, $3,000,000; making a total recommendation of $993,000,000. These items have been investigated and surveys and plans made. It is shown in the report how soon they can commence work. On most of them they can commence at once. Some will take a week, some a month, and some three months, three months being the longest. The program is ready to start.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator if he includes rivers and harbors with the others? In the enumeration I did not hear that mentioned.

Mr. TRAMMELL. A great many of the projects have been authorized. I think a major portion of them have been authorized already. I understand from the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] that all of them have been authorized. Of course if we make authorization for $150,000,000 to make a beginning upon the construction program, then the particular projects will have to come before Congress for consideration in the making of an appropriation. Congress would not be barred from passing upon the merits of the particular items for which appropriations are estimated under this authorization. It is essential to get an authorization to take up the different projects.

My zeal and my eagerness in trying to assist the distressed of the country, and those who are unemployed, is not restricted merely to a particular method outlined in the particular bill, and to no other. My eagerness to assist them would enlarge the program. Some Senators may not desire to do that. They may desire to confine it absolutely to a particular plan which they have mapped out.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I rise simply to give the Senator some information in relation to the report. It was submitted in accordance with a resolution introduced by myself, and I have given some considerable study to it. I am able to say that the entire amount of $993,000,000 has already been authorized, except so far as road construction is concerned. This includes the program of road construction for six years. Only two years have been authorized, so there are four years included which have not been authorized. The remainder has already all been authorized by Congress, and simply awaits the appropriation, so it would not help the situation to again authorize what has already been authorized.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, the object of the amendment is to emphasize in the relief measure the sentiment of Congress that we should proceed with the construction program and that in our plan to feed the hungry and assist the distressed people of the country and to give them employment we are not going to restrict our sources through which we would assist them to merely giving to the States and to the road-building program, but that we are willing to begin construction work and provide public buildings and enlarge that feature of the governmental activities.

I would like very much to see the amendment adopted. I think it would help materially in taking care of the unemployed. It will possibly lessen the requirements under the $375,000,000 gift that is proposed to be made to the States. If we take them out of unemployment, then we will have fewer people to feed through a gift or charity. I believe it would be better to have them employed than to have to feed that same number through charity. I hope the amendment will be adopted. Of the millions of unemployed, easily 90 per cent of them prefer work and an independent living to charity from any source. What I proposed by the amendment I have offered is to enlarge the field for employment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following new section:

"SEC. 3. Not to exceed $75,000,000 of the amount authorized by section 1 of Title II shall be available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Treasury for the acquisition of sites or additional land for the enlargement of sites for, and/or the construction, enlarging, remodeling, or extension of, public buildings under the control of the Treasury Department in cities for which allocations have heretofore been made, but for which estimates have not been submitted to Congress. Such amount may be expended without regard to the provisions of section 4 of the public buildings act of May 25, 1926, requiring the submission of estimates to the Bureau of the Budget, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to fix the limit of cost for each of such projects. Expenditures for professional services may be made from such amount without regard to any act limiting expenditures for outside professional services. Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized under the act of May 25, 1926, as amended, and, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be expended in accordance with existing law."

Mr. STEIWER. I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is one proposal which does not increase the authorization contained in title 2 of the bill. It merely provides an additional purpose for which the moneys may be spent. In other words, it takes $75,000,000 out of the fund which is provided in title 2 for the construction of highways and makes it available for expenditure by the Secretary of the Treasury in the construction of the public buildings which are included in the public-buildings program under the act of 1926 and for which allocations have already been made.

The virtue of the proposal is that it would make work available in certain communities where roads might not be needed. I make bold to offer the amendment because it has been repeatedly said here that the road-building program is being overdone by the proposals contained in the bill. I am not sure I subscribe to that idea, but if there are Senators who are seriously urging it, then it seems to me it is only the part of wisdom to diversify the purposes for which the money may be expended. Certainly the highway program which is greatly expanded by the provisions of title 2 of the bill can not be in any way injured by the diversion of $75,000,000 out of the total of $375,000,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that the projects covered by the Senator's amendment have already been authorized by previous acts of Congress and allotments have been made by the Treasury Department, but there is no appropriation out of which they can proceed with the construction.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true.

Mr. BARKLEY. All they need is an appropriation. What good is another authorization for the same project until we get appropriations, which is the only thing they need and which they may obtain when we have the Treasury Department appropriation bill under consideration at this session?

Mr. STEIWER. To be perfectly candid with the Senator, the chief value of the idea is that it avoids the necessity of sending these items to the Bureau of the Budget for Budget approval, and would enable the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed immediately under the authorization heretofore made by Congress.

Mr. BARKLEY. We do not have to do this as a second authorization in order to do what we have already authorized to be done but which is not being done.

Mr. STEIWER. That is true; and yet it seems to me there is an enormous advantage in taking some part of this money away from the highway program which is vastly augmented by the bill and permitting that same money to be used in building projects which are distributed all over the country.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator really is not taking any money away from anything. He is taking an authorization away from another authorization which we have already made by an act of Congress, so it does not really involve taking any money away from anything.

Mr. STEIWER. That is not exactly correct. This provision would create a new and different authorization for the same projects by a new and different procedure, and undoubtedly will expedite the construction of the buildings. That is all I seek to accomplish.

Mr. BARKLEY. That raises the question as to how many authorizations it will take to get one appropriation.

Mr. STEIWER. I answer that my purpose is not to get the appropriation but to expedite the construction contemplated. I am advised by the Treasury Department that there is a total of about 250 new projects, for which allocations have already been made but for which the appropriations will not be made without Budget approval and appropriations by Congress. These amount to between $75,000,000 and $80,000,000. I shall be quite content whether the amendment is agreed to or not agreed to, but it seems to me it is vastly better to diversify the purposes of Title II by the means suggested in this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the engrossing and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill having been read a third time, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long before the final vote. I wish to point out that after two weeks of debate a majority of the Senate has gone on record for Federal action in meeting the critical emergency of unemployment relief.

The Senate's position to-day is in marked contrast with the attitude indicated by leaders in the Senate before the bill was taken up for discussion. The public press carried reports that the bill was to be recommitted to the committee on the ground there was not sufficient evidence to demonstrate the need for Federal action. We have made some advance toward relief of suffering by convincing a majority of the Senate that action by the Federal Government to relieve actual human misery in the communities and States of the country is necessary.

So far as I know—and I have endeavored to be present during all the debate—only three Senators have denied the sufficiency of the evidence presented in this case in behalf of Federal action. The first was the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is likewise chairman of the Republican National Committee. When asked by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] whether or not he would vote to appropriate Federal funds in a case where a local community was unable to provide for its citizens in distress, he answered:

I would insist on the local authorities doing their duty.

Stripped of its verbiage, the statement of the Senator from Ohio reveals that he takes the position that he would let people starve before he would vote to give aid to the States from the Federal Treasury to prevent such a calamity. The phrase used by the Senator from Ohio—should go down in history with the remark of Queen Marie Antoinette when she heard people crying for bread and asked why they did not eat cake.

I would insist on the local authorities doing their duty—

The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] followed with a statement that the evidence submitted by the proponents of the bill was not sufficient to warrant action by the Federal Government to protect its citizens from the horrible consequences of unemployment. On the very day the senior Senator from Pennsylvania made his speech, Horatio Gates Lloyd, a member of the firm of Drexel & Co., of Philadelphia, who is chairman of the relief committee in the city of Philadelphia, made a statement in which he said—

The relief—

That is, the relief in Philadelphia—

now averages $4.38 per week, a distressingly inadequate amount, but all that the funds of the committee permit.

The record shows that the average family on the relief rolls in the city of Philadelphia consists of approximately five persons. In the State where the Senator from Pennsylvania said they can take care of their own, 12½ cents per day per capita is all that is given to keep men, women, and children alive. Rent payments are not made, except to prevent eviction; due to lack of funds, the committee is unable to provide decent housing facilities. The horrible conditions of overcrowding and the breaking up of families in the city of Philadelphia causes me to say that the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania that all is well in the communities of his State suggests Matthew's description of the whited sepulcher, which outwardly appeared to men beautiful but within was full of dead men's bones and of all filthiness.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] joined to-day with those other two Senators I have mentioned who say that the evidence as to necessity for Federal action is insufficient. I digress in answer to him only long enough to say that last winter, before the unemployment situation had reached the critical stage we find to-day, he was the author of a bill providing that the Federal Government should appropriate money to meet 50 per cent of the relief burden month by month in every city and community in the United States. If action was justified in 1930–31 to take care of relief, and the necessity for it was at that time evident, how much more compelling is the evidence in support of action by the Federal Government to save humanity in the United States to-day?

Mr. President, if I understood the argument made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts, it was this: If the depression were short lived—in other words, if there were no great unemployment problem and if economic recovery was certain and immediate—he would advocate action by the Federal Government to relieve human suffering in the United States. The length of the depression, however, and the increase in the need for relief makes it impossible for him to stand by the position he took last year. In other words, the greater the need for Federal assistance to relieve human suffering, the less the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to do to meet the problem. I can not follow the logic of the argument made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

The opposition to the pending bill has, on the one hand, come from those who contend that it will set up a great Federal bureaucracy for the purpose of providing relief to individuals within the several communities in the States, and, on the other hand, from those who contend that the authors of this bill have not provided sufficient control on the part of the Federal Government in the administration of relief funds contributed from the National Treasury. I submit that an impartial analysis of the measure now under consideration will convince any fair-minded Senator that this bill provides a workable and a satisfactory means whereby the Federal Government may give assistance to cities, counties, and States in meeting the problem of unemployment relief, but at the same time extends to them the greatest measure of control over the administration and distribution of the funds contributed.

The bill provides a minimum Federal supervision consistent with good government, which was the paraphrase of Thomas Jefferson's attitude used by the Senator from Alabama in opposing the measure. The greatest living interpreter of Thomas Jefferson, Claude Bowers, has written publicly indicating his approval of the bill. He is not unfamiliar with legislative procedure in this body. He was for many years the able secretary of the one-time minority leader in this Chamber, John W. Kern, of Indiana. Mr. Bowers delivered the principal address at the Jackson Day dinner in 1928. He made the keynote speech at the national convention in Houston in 1928. He is the author of Party Battles of the Jackson Period and the Tragic Era. He can not be charged with being a Hamiltonian, nor would he indicate approval of any proposal which violated the fundamental principles laid down by Thomas Jefferson.

In brief, all that a State has to do in order to obtain assistance from the Federal Government under the terms of the pending bill is to furnish general plans for adequate administration of relief within its borders and certain information concerning the amounts it has expended for relief, both public and private.

There is a long list of precedents in which Federal aid has been granted in cooperation with the States to secure various objectives. This measure is in absolute conformity with those precedents. The only difference is that it does not give to the Federal Government nearly as much control over the expenditure of funds as is provided in all our other Federal-aid legislation.

Forty per cent of the funds provided in this bill will be apportioned on the basis of population. This basis was selected because it provides a speedy means of securing the distribution of a portion of the funds to meet the critical emergency. It provides likewise that not to exceed two-thirds of the amount raised within a State in a given calendar year can be met by this apportionment of 40 per cent of the funds. In other words, a 60-40 ratio is established in meeting this burden. As an example, a State which has raised $6,000,000 within its borders by public appropriation and by private charity could, assuming that its population is large enough, receive $4,000,000 from the 40 per cent fund, to be apportioned on the basis of population.

There is, however, a further check upon the distribution of money on the basis of population, in order to prevent any State, if there be one, from having its entire burden taken over by the Federal Government. It is the provision that, on the basis of population, the Federal Government's contribution shall not exceed 40 per cent of the relief load as demonstrated by the estimates and information furnished to the Federal Government.

Sixty per cent of the amount provided in this bill, Mr. President, is to be in a reserve fund for allocation to the States on the basis of need, in order to take care of situations where either the apportionment on the basis of population is or the resources of a particular Commonwealth are insufficient to meet the relief burden. In such cases the States may then receive from the reserve fund a larger allotment in order to relieve human suffering.

Such a provision is necessary if we are to have effective legislation to meet the complex situations in the various States. Naturally, in a country as diversified as this one, the economic storm has not struck everywhere with the same intensity nor at the same time. Therefore, if there is to be adequate provision to meet the problem of unemployment relief, there must be emergency funds available for the purpose of handling situations as they arise.

Nowhere in this bill is there a single provision which provides that the Federal relief board shall deal directly with a locality or a community. Only in the provision concerning migratory workers is there a single proposal in this bill which anticipates or contemplates or authorizes this board to appropriate directly a single dollar of money for the relief of a single individual in any community.

If this bill is written into law, the States and the local communities will formulate a plan for meeting the problem of unemployment relief within their commonwealths. The plan will then be submitted to the Federal board; and on the approval of those general plans the funds will then be allocated on the basis of population and on the basis of need, if necessary. Thus the administration of these funds will be in the hands of the State and local authorities, and so far as the recipient is concerned they will be merged with the public and private resources which are now being given to individuals in those communities.

May I say to any Senator who has been worried concerning the effect of Federal contributions as provided under the bill that not a single dollar of that Federal money will be earmarked. So far as the persons who are receiving relief are concerned, they will be unaware that the Federal Government has acted, excepting that relief will be more adequate and reach a level of human decency instead of the animal level of survival which now exists in this country.

The bill has a specific provision that the State must set up its own agency, in order that responsibility may be fixed upon the State for the administration of this relief. Of course, in view of the fact that $375,000,000 may be taken from the Federal Treasury in order to meet the relief problems in the various States in the Union, there is a provision in the bill which I think sound legislation demands—that this Federal board may decline to issue further grants or to make further allotments to any State which is misappropriating funds.

Such a safeguard is contained in all Federal-aid legislation, and it should be contained in every bill which provides that the Federal Government is to take Federal money and turn it over to the States for administration. Otherwise, what might be the situation? We might be confronted with the same situation that has recently occurred in the State of the Senator from Alabama, where a number of citizens have been indicted on the charge that they entered into a conspiracy to obtain money under false pretenses from the seed and feed loan contained in the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill of last session. I can not believe any Senator wants a situation created where the Federal Government would be helpless to prevent the misappropriation of funds provided by the Federal Government to relieve human suffering.

So far as I am concerned, I do not expect any such situation to arise; but if it did, and if the authors of this bill and Senators who supported it had not provided such a safeguard, they would be subject to public censure for not having adequately protected the taxpayers' money and the men, women, and children who are in want.

The bill also contains provisions which will permit every State and every community to employ the same relief methods and programs which they now have under way. There is no attempt in this legislation to force any scientific system or the same system upon all of the communities of the country. The bill is purposely drawn so that every project and every proposal for relief that is now being employed in the United States may come under the terms of this bill and may receive assistance from the Federal Government in carrying out those projects adequately and commensurately.

Briefly, I desire to contrast the provisions concerning relief administration which I have cited in this bill and those under which the $375,000,000 fund for Federal highways would have been administered under the Walsh-Black-Bulkley substitute and under this bill if it becomes a law.

According to the Federal highway act approved November 9, 1921, among other things, section 6 provides:

> That in approving projects to receive Federal aid under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall give preference to such projects as will expedite the completion of an adequate and connected system of highways, interstate in character.
> Before any projects are approved in any State, such State, through its State highway department, shall select or designate a system of highways not to exceed 7 per cent of the total highway mileage of such State as shown by the records of the State highway department at the time of the passage of this act.

Further on:

> The Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to approve in whole or in part the systems as designated or to require modifications or revisions thereof: Provided, That the States shall submit to the Secretary of Agriculture for his approval any proposed revisions of the designated systems of highways above provided for.

In section 8, in part, the act provides:

> The Secretary of Agriculture shall approve the types and width of construction and reconstruction and the character of improvement, repair, and maintenance in each case, consideration being given to the type and character which shall be best suited for each locality and to the probable character and extent of the future traffic.

In section 9 it is provided further:

> That all highways constructed or reconstructed under the provisions of this act shall be free from tolls of all kinds.
> That all highways in the primary or interstate system constructed after the passage of this act shall have a right of way of ample width and a wearing surface of an adequate width, which shall not be less than 18 feet, unless, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, it is rendered impracticable by physical conditions, excessive costs, probable traffic requirements, or legal obstacles.

Section 11 provides:

> That any State having complied with the provisions of this act, and desiring to avail itself of the benefits thereof, shall by its State highway department submit to the Secretary of Agriculture project statements setting forth proposed construction or reconstruction of any primary or interstate, or secondary or intercounty highway therein.

Again, in section 12:

> The construction and reconstruction work and labor in each State shall be done in accordance with its laws and under the direct supervision of the State highway department, subject to the inspection and approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, and in accordance with the rules and regulations pursuant to this act.

In contrast with the drastic control over State projects under the Federal highway act, the pending bill provides a minimum of Federal control over the relief fund.

The bill provides relief assistance under Title I. It gets it to the States quickly. It has a provision for meeting the emergency relief load on the basis of need. It contains a provision which will stimulate the activities of relief agencies, public and private, within every community in the country. If our experience with all other Federal-aid legislation is of any value, the passage of this bill will serve to greatly increase the amounts raised for relief within the States.

It is contended that if the Federal Government acts, all efforts on the part of the States, the communities, and private charities will cease. The question of action by the State of New Jersey has been under discussion in that Commonwealth. The argument has been advanced there that action by the State of New Jersey will result in drying up the funds being provided by the local communities and by private charity.

I wish to quote briefly from a statement by Chester Irving Barnard, who is now president of the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co., a director of the Fidelity Union Trust Co., the Prudential Insurance Co. of America, and the American Insurance Co. He has been at the head of the State activities for unemployment relief in New Jersey, and his statements are made after a careful consideration of the relief problem.

In his interim report on "Unemployment and relief conditions in New Jersey" he says:

> Relief should be paid for from current revenues. This means taxes. It is not and should not be a question of what we like but of what we ought to do. It is no longer a matter of listening to general objections to taxes but of appraising ability to pay, and seeing that payment is made. The counsels of stupid selfishness will no longer suffice to protect the ends of that selfishness. Every other scheme of taking care of relief seems to me to involve a process of letting the selfish try to put their just share of the burdens of public welfare on those who are least able to carry them, and who have, in a financial sense, the least to be preserved by public welfare.

Further on he said:

> Nevertheless, the general public support of an emergency relief condition is, it seems to me, the duty of all the people; and that duty can only be discharged by the government of all the people on their behalf. It costs less, it is less depressing, it is more just, and certainly it still leaves ample opportunity for every personal charity.

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States must face the momentous issue of human suffering. It can not be avoided. It must be settled, and settled rightly. The people will drive from office men who refuse to act in the face of overwhelming evidence of hunger, privation, and want.

A share of this tremendous relief burden must be met in part by the Federal income and inheritance taxpayers. To throw the burden back onto the States and local communities is to put the load upon real estate and tangible property. It means that the taxes must be raised by the farmer and the home owner without regard to his ability to meet the burden.

Likewise let it be remembered that the communities and the States have been manfully carrying this staggering relief load for two and a half years in a period of serious depression. The credit of many communities and of some States is now impaired. They are under the domination of bankers in their communities, who dictate terms and force changes not only in budgets but in important questions of public policy. As a result relief is being curtailed even below the level of survival.

An estimate has been made that there are $35,000,000,000 of outstanding obligations of cities, counties, and States in this Union. Those who insist that this relief burden must be carried by the local communities and the States take the position, in the last analysis, that before a dollar of assistance will be given by the Federal Government the States, the counties, and the municipalities must go into bankruptcy before those Senators will vote for relief. Is that sound statesmanship? Must whole communities and States become pauperized before relief can be obtained?

Mr. President, if that course is followed, in the end there will be a wholesale repudiation of the outstanding obligation of States and local communities in this country.

According to the President of the United States, this is an emergency second only to war. Those who advocated the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill justified sweeping aside all precedent on the ground that they must give aid to the railroads, the insurance companies, and the banks because we were in a national emergency. No Senator rose then and proposed that before any action should be taken by the Federal Government the governors of the 48 States must petition Congress to act. Oh, no. You were ready then to act without evidence, without any appeal on the part of the governors or the mayors of the various communities of this country. When it came to extending aid to those interested in these great corporations Senators were willing to act upon the whispered order, upon the whispered admonition of individuals representing those corporations.

Now, when the objective we seek to obtain is the relief of men, women, and children who are starving in the United States, Senators say that they can not act because the governors of the 48 States have not appealed to Congress.

There are several governors, Mr. President, who have already indicated that they regard Federal legislation in this situation as necessary. But I suppose some Senators would say that before the Federal Government could act we must have a majority of the governors of the States asking assistance, and if we got a majority of them, I suppose they would apply the two-thirds rule and insist that we must have two-thirds of the governors of the States asking for assistance before they could vote for this legislation.

Mr. President, the representatives of the wage earners of this country have petitioned Congress to act. Are they not, in your eyes, well-credentialed spokesmen for the toilers and the wage earners of this country? They have not acted in undue haste. The American Federation of Labor reversed its policy, adopted during the fore part of this depression, that it would not ask for any assistance. Driven by the force of circumstances in the communities of this country, reluctantly they now appear here and beseech you, in behalf of their membership and in behalf of the unorganized workers of this country, to act in order to prevent starvation.

Failure of the Federal Government to act in this situation means the degradation of millions of our people; it means that the living standards of American citizens, of which we have long been proud, will descend to pauper levels. Millions of our people are now reduced to the animal level of mere subsistence. Malnutrition and disease are already making themselves manifest in this country. Those who fail to support this bill must share the responsibility for crippling millions of the coming generation in body, if not in mind, due to malnutrition.

Can it be that there is anyone who views with complacency the loss of the social progress of this country which we have achieved after 50 years of effort? Are there any here, I ask, who welcome the effects of this depression because they hope for cheap labor in the United States, reduced to the Chinese coolie level of 12½ cents a day?

Mr. President, is the political support of income-tax payers and the political campaign fund contributors more important than the preservation of human life? Senators must answer that question when the roll is called.

I want to read briefly from the speech made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] last winter in appealing for action upon his bill to provide that the Federal Government should pay monthly to the States and to the communities 50 per cent of their unemployment relief burden. This was shortly after the elections of 1930, in which the Democratic Party made substantial gains. Said the Senator from Massachusetts:

> It seems to me that the most casual observer of the situation here in Washington must be convinced that the first thought of many of those in high position is a tender care of the heavy taxpayers of this country. That is foremost with too many; that concern is above starvation and poverty and unemployment and suffering; and that attitude, my friends upon the other side of the Chamber, was one of the reasons why millions of men and women flocked to the polls last November—not to elect Democrats but to protest, to denounce, to condemn an administration that had been indifferent, to put it mildly, to the greatest problem we have witnessed in 50 years of peace time in this country.
> The election in November was a repudiation of the administration not because we had hard times but largely because of a feeling that there was not in the White House a zealous, earnest leader, who, though he personally might sympathize with conditions, yet he was either unable or unwilling to propose means of aiding the victims of this problem.
> Mr. President, I want to close with a single word to my Democratic colleagues.
> We are no longer a minority party in this country. The last election placed upon us a responsibility of leadership. Mr. Hoover has failed to present an adequate program. His message is an abdication of leadership so far as this economic problem is concerned. I submit that it is our business, if we want the confidence of this country, to stop further general criticism, bring on our own program, stand together for it, announce to the country that it is our program, have a roll call, let the opposition reject it if they choose, but let us go on record. Let our fellow countrymen know what we would do if we had the power.

The statement made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts a year ago was applicable to the situation then. It is even more tragically applicable to the situation to-day.

I read an editorial which appeared in the Washington Daily News, a Scripps-Howard newspaper, on February 15. It is entitled "Shall the Hungry Be Fed?" It reads:

SHALL THE HUNGRY BE FED?

The debate drawing to a close in the Senate over Federal unemployment relief narrows itself down to one question, Shall the hungry be fed?

Ironically, it is the men who oppose action by the Federal Government who talk most about saving her institutions. If these institutions should be attacked before the winter is over by desperate, violent mobs of American men and women, the responsibility would rest on these "defenders." The time has come when a choice must be made between form and substance.

Last Friday there were hunger riots in Newfoundland. A mob of unemployed stormed the council chamber, attacked the Premier, and was finally given food by the Government. Will the spirit of American "individualism" be preserved by letting misery reach that point in the United States?

There is no immediate threat of violence in this country. Through the early part of the winter suffering has been kept partially at bay by local relief agencies. But in large areas of the country hunger is steadily gaining on the meager local resources fighting it.

Some cities are now spending the last of their relief funds. Many are bankrupt. And men and women will not die passively while food to save them, to save their children, is all about them—but just out of reach.

The most devoted patriotism dies before the will to survive. With the best intent in the world, local governments and relief agencies can not fight alone any longer for the safety of America.

Even if necessity did not make Federal aid inevitable, circumstances make it just. The wealth of this country is concentrated in a few States. It derives from natural resources and from businesses throughout the country, but it is held and taxed in limited areas.

Only the Federal Government can tax wealth wherever it may be found, for the benefit of districts where there is no longer any way they may get the money for themselves. The Governor of New York, richest State in the Union, has recognized the justice of this and indorsed Federal relief. His State will get less from Federal aid than the amount its citizens will pay in Federal taxes for this purpose.

Wealth, generally, is fighting Federal relief because it will have to pay. But this attitude is less selfish than stupid. Intelligent selfishness should make those who have, and who want to keep on having under America's code of individualism, willing to feed the needy at whatever cost. Those whose love for America is deep and wise will follow this course.

Mr. President, I appeal to Senators in this body not to be as blind as were the Bourbons in France before the revolution. I appeal to them not to be as blind as were the princes and princesses of Israel whom Micah accused of being those "who also eat the flesh of my people and flay their skin from off them and break their bones and chop them in pieces, as for the pot, and as flesh within the caldron."

The issue of the preservation of human life in America is irrepressible. It will not down. We are to determine today whether a majority of the United States Senate believe government was instituted to protect the general welfare of all the people or only to protect the welfare of the privileged few. For the suffering men and women who are cold and hungry, on behalf of little children who are sick and without enough to eat, I beseech the Senate to pass the bill.

Mr. President, I ask leave to incorporate in my address a portion of an article by Claude G. Bowers in the Washington Times of the 5th instant. It is as follows:

THE TWO PLANS BEFORE CONGRESS

This is a nation of something more than 120,000,000 people. Of these 24,000,000 are said to be living in abject poverty because of the lack of work. This is more than one-sixth of the population. And 12,000,000 are living on charity, and this is a tenth of the entire Nation.

That really is as startling as the fall in the price of stocks.

The bankers and railroads required "relief" largely because of their blunders, and, in the case of the bankers, largely because of their greed. These men, women, and children who are jobless are not responsible for their plight; they are the victims.

There are two plans before Congress for the relief of these victims.

One is the measure sponsored by Senator WAGNER for a prosperity loan to furnish work; and Senator LA FOLLETTE has a similar measure providing for a larger loan.

The other is Senator LA FOLLETTE'S bill to appropriate $375,000,000 for direct relief. Whatever you may think about that, do not let anyone tell you it is a "dole." It is nothing of the sort.

The Federal Government is merely called upon to do its part to prevent starvation. States, counties, and municipalities have appropriated for the purpose and no human being has complained or denounced it as a "dole." These local community governments in many instances have exhausted their resources. Some are bankrupt. Most are in distress.

And the La Follette measure merely provides that, in the case of these communities, the Federal Government shall furnish the money they no longer are able to appropriate. The Government in Washington gives to no individual; it does not supervise the distribution down to the individual; it merely furnishes the money for distribution through the same relief agencies that have been distributing the money hitherto appropriated by the city or county that can do no more.

To say that one is a "dole" and the other is not a "dole" is sheer dishonesty.

Mr. President, I ask leave to incorporate in my remarks the pending bill as amended. It is as follows:

A bill (S. 3045) to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

TITLE I

That it is hereby declared to be the policy of the Congress to cooperate with the several States in furnishing relief to their needy and distressed people and in relieving the hardship resulting from unemployment.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $375,000,000, to be immediately available, for allocation to the several States by the Federal Emergency Relief Board created by section 3 in the manner hereinafter provided. Not more than $125,000,000 of this amount shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby created a Federal Emergency Relief Board (hereinafter referred to as the board), which shall consist of the Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor, the Director of Extension Work in the Department of Agriculture, the Chief of the Vocational Rehabilitation Service of the Federal Board for Vocational Education, and two members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The board shall have full power of allocation of funds under the provisions of this title, and shall exercise the functions provided for in this title. The members of the board shall elect their own chairman, and shall receive no compensation for their services as members, except that the two appointed members shall be paid a per diem compensation of $25 for time devoted to the work of the board, and except that the members of the board shall be paid necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government. The board shall cease to exist upon the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this title, and upon the termination of the board's existence all unexpended moneys held by it shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(b) The board—

(1) Shall make such regulations as may be necessary to execute the functions vested in it by this title.

(2) Shall print monthly for public distribution and shall submit to the President and to the Senate and the House of Representatives (or the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session) a report of its activities and expenditures, together with a statement showing the condition of the fund administered by it. And also a report giving the names of its employees engaged in administering the relief herein provided and the character of the services performed by each and the salary paid to each. Such reports shall, when submitted, be printed as public documents.

(c) The Chief of the Children's Bureau in the Department of Labor shall be charged with the administration of this title, subject to the supervision of the board. The Chief of the Children's Bureau—

(1) Shall insure that the conditions under which funds are allocated to the States under this title are complied with, and shall make or cause to be made such studies and reports as will promote the efficient administration of this title;

(2) Shall submit reports to the board with respect to the allocation of funds;

(3) Shall supply information for the guidance of the States in the administration of funds under this title;

(4) After the approval of the board, may appoint and fix the compensation of such experts and, subject to the provisions of the civil service laws, appoint, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, fix the compensation of such other officers and employees as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this title;

(5) Subject to the approval of the board, may make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of government and elsewhere, and for printing and binding) as are necessary to carry out the provisions of this title; and

(6) Shall perform such other functions under this title (other than the allocation of funds) as the board may designate.

(d) The board may appoint advisory committees to advise and confer with it with respect to the administration of this title. No salary shall be paid to committee members, but when attending meetings of the board they shall be allowed necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, or per diem allowance in lieu thereof, within the limitations prescribed by law for civilian employees in the executive branch of the Government.

SEC. 4. (a) Forty per cent of the amounts appropriated pursuant to this title shall be apportioned among the several States, in the manner hereinafter provided, in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the State of the United States according to the Fifteenth Decennial Census. Payments made in any calendar year out of the amount of the appropriations apportioned to any State on the basis of population shall not be in excess of two-thirds of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available for such calendar year by the State, by the civil subdivisions thereof, and by private contributions from within the State, to be expended for emergency relief as defined in section 12 of this title.

(b) The balance of the amounts so appropriated shall be available (1) for administrative expenses of the Federal agencies under this title, and (2) as a reserve fund for emergency allotments, as provided in section 10, to the States where the amounts apportioned on the basis of population are insufficient to meet the need.

(c) The amounts apportioned or allocated to any State under this title shall be available for payment to and expenditure by such State, for the purposes of this title, until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this title; except that at the expiration of the calendar year 1932, if the amount certified prior to the expiration of such year for payment to any State out of amounts apportioned on the basis of population under this title in the manner hereinafter provided is less than one-half of the total amount apportioned to that State on the basis of population, the difference between the amount so certified and one-half of the total amount apportioned shall be added to the reserve fund and shall be available for allotment to the several States on the basis of need.

(d) So much, not to exceed $350,000, of the appropriations set aside in the reserve fund, as the Children's Bureau, with the approval of the board, shall estimate to be necessary for administering the provisions of this title, shall be deducted for that purpose, to remain available until expended.

(e) If the State agency, designated or created in accordance with section 5 of this title, shall certify to the board that it is without the funds necessary to obtain the information specified in section 6 of this title as a basis for State plans, the board may authorize immediate payment to such State of not to exceed $5,000, and the amount of any such payment shall be deducted from the apportionment to such State on the basis of population.

SEC. 5. (a) In order to obtain payments out of the appropriations authorized in section 2 of this title a State, through its legislative authority, shall designate or create a State agency to cooperate with the board; except that if the legislature of any State is not in session and has not made provision to that end, the governor of such State may designate or create an agency to cooperate with the board. In any State having a State department of welfare or charities such department shall administer the provisions of this title, except that in any State in which, in accordance with the law of the State, there has been set up a special emergency organization for the administration of relief, such special State agency may be the administrative agency of the State under this title: Provided, That in any State where no state-wide board of charities exists, or no special emergency organization has been set up, the amount allotted to any such State shall be distributed by the action of the governor and the State board constituted for controlling the financial affairs of such State, if such board exists; and if it does not exist, by the governor.

(b) Relief shall be administered within each State under rules and regulations adopted by the State authorities and approved by the board in accordance with section 6 of this title.

SEC. 6. (a) Any State making application for funds under this title shall, by the agency designated or created to cooperate with the board, submit at such times as may be prescribed by the board plans for carrying out the provisions of this title within such State. The plans shall be subject to the approval of the board and shall, within the discretion of the board, include the following: (1) An estimate of the amounts appropriated or otherwise made available, and of the amounts actually expended, for emergency relief by public and private agencies in the State, for the calendar years 1929, 1930, and 1931; (2) an estimate of the amounts necessary to meet the needs of emergency relief in the State in the calendar year 1932 and, upon call of the board, in the calendar year 1933; (3) provision for adequate State administrative personnel; (4) specification of the plans to be developed for local administration; and (5) provision satisfactory to the board for securing the benefits contemplated by this title to persons within the State, irrespective of the period of residence within the State.

SEC. 7. Within the limits of the apportionment made to any State on the basis of population the board may certify the payment to the State of not more than 40 per cent of the difference between estimated emergency relief expenditures in the State for the calendar year 1929 and the estimated needs of the State for the calendar year 1932 or 1933, as the case may be.

SEC. 8. Within 10 days after an appropriation has been made under authority of this title the Children's Bureau shall make the apportionment on the basis of population provided in this title, shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the treasurers of the several States the amount apportioned to each State on the basis of population, and shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount estimated by the bureau, with the approval of the board, to be necessary for administering the provisions of this title. Such estimate shall be subject to subsequent review and revision by the board.

SEC. 9. Within 60 days after any appropriation has been made under the authority of this title, and as often thereafter while such appropriation remains available as conditions may warrant, the Children's Bureau shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury, as to each of the several States, (1) whether the State has designated or created an agency to cooperate with the Children's Bureau in compliance with the provisions of this title; (2) the amounts, if any, which have been made available by such State, including funds made available by civil subdivisions thereof and private contributions from within the State; (3) whether plans have been submitted and accepted pursuant to the provisions of this title; and (4) the amount of the payments, if any, to which the State is entitled under the provisions of this title. Such certificate shall, unless revoked as provided in section 11 of this title, be sufficient authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to make payment to the State in accordance therewith.

SEC. 10. (a) Whenever, from the statement furnished by the State agency and verified by the board, it appears that the combined moneys available from local and State funds within the State, supplemented by any moneys paid or to be paid to the State from the apportionment on the basis of population, will fall below the estimated needs for emergency relief in any State, the board shall consider the State eligible for allotment of the reserve funds to be allotted to the several States on the basis of need; but no such allocation shall be made to any State unless the board is satisfied that the State or its political subdivisions have made reasonable efforts within their resources to provide for emergency relief expenditures.

(b) The board is authorized, either in cooperation with the several States, through special grants or otherwise, or by such other means and agencies as it may determine, to make payments out of the reserve fund for the purpose of extending relief to migratory workers and their families, who, by reason of inability to establish legal residence within any State, are unable to qualify her benefits under any State relief plan.

SEC. 11. Each State agency cooperating with the board under the provisions of this title shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed or requested by the board. The board may revoke any existing certificate or withhold any further certificate provided for in section 9 whenever it shall determine as to any State that the State agency has not properly expended or supervised the expenditure of moneys paid to it in accordance with the plans approved under this title. Before any such certificate shall be revoked or withheld from any State the board shall give notice in writing to the State agency stating specifically wherein the State has failed to comply with such plans.

SEC. 12. The term "emergency relief," when used in this title with respect to State expenditures, means relief in the form of money or commodities furnished by the State or its civil subdivisions or by private contributions from within the State, to persons in their abode or habitation, or in shelters for the transient and homeless, or in the form of wages or other compensation for work furnished on the basis of need, and made necessary by reason of the emergency growing out of unemployment, over and above the usual and ordinary expenditures for such relief, but not including old-age pensions under special acts, or public aid under special acts to mothers for the care of dependent children, or relief to veterans under special acts; and the term "relief," when used in this title with respect to the allocation of funds by the board, shall be construed to include the same purposes as those included in emergency relief, and expenditures for such purposes are hereby authorized. In either case the decision of the board as to the purpose of any expenditure shall be final.

SEC. 13. This title shall be construed as intending to secure to the several States control of the administration of this title within their respective territorial limits, subject only to the provisions and purposes of this title.

TITLE II

SECTION 1. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $375,000,000 (one-third of which shall be immediately available) for the purpose of the construction and reconstruction of highways under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented. Such amount shall be in addition to any amounts heretofore authorized to be appropriated for such purposes, but not more than $125,000,000 thereof shall be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932.

SEC. 2. The sums appropriated pursuant to the authorization contained in section 1 of this title shall, from time to time, be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture among the several States in the manner provided by section 21 of the Federal highway act, as amended, and shall be available for expenditure upon highway projects approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, in the same manner as other funds appropriated for carrying out the provisions of such act; except that no part of such amounts apportioned to any State need be matched by State funds, and except that such amounts may be expended upon highways, streets, or bridges within the limits of municipalities without regard to the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities. The work on highways shall be done in such manner as to use the maximum amount of human labor consistent with economy, and preference in employment shall be given to the unemployed. When the Secretary of Agriculture finds that any highway project approved by him in any State has been constructed or reconstructed in compliance with the plans and specifications relating thereto, he shall cause to be paid the proper authorities of the State, out of amounts appropriated pursuant to this act, an amount equal to the total cost of such project, and may, in his discretion, from time to time make such payments on such construction or reconstruction as the same progresses; but the total amount so paid to the State shall not exceed the amount apportioned to that State as hereinbefore provided.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the issue were that which has been drawn by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], I would without hesitation take the side I have always taken and that I shall always take. The issue here, however, has narrowed down to a far more simple proposition. The issue is whether a single bill written in a single way must be accepted. The issue is one which is irrepressible and always has been irrepressible, namely, whether we shall trust our Government to the people who make it up, or to certain specially favored political bureaus in the Capital of the Nation.

In so far as the proposition of taxing the incomes of those who have concentrated the wealth of the Nation is concerned, I have no hesitation in saying here and elsewhere that I favor a greatly increased tax on the higher income brackets. I favor an increased levy of taxes upon the concentrated and swollen fortunes of the Nation. I favor it frankly for the same reason expressed by that great political philosopher who said that the history of every government has some time reached that situation when concentrated wealth must be tapped at its source in order that the privileged few might not feed on the fat produced by the toil of the many. There is no difference between the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and myself upon that issue. He can not make any.

The wealth of the Nation has been concentrated in a few favored centers due to the maladministration of our system of government, until, in my judgment, the time has arrived when by law, and by our system of taxation, we should have more Federal assistance for public education; for public welfare; and for improving the social conditions of the people of the Nation. I deny that the mere fact that great wealth is concentrated in one particular center means necessarily and logically that such wealth has been produced in that center. As a matter of fact, the wealth of the Nation is produced by the people who work, and by nature that yields its bounty to the man in the mine, in the factory, in the shop, and in the field.

But, Mr. President, there is another issue to be considered in connection with the legislation which is before us. Admitting, as I admit, that we should have more Federal assistance because of the fact that the Federal Government can tap sources of wealth which the States can not touch, the next question is, Shall the people, in order to obtain the benefits of the taxing privilege of the Federal Government, surrender to a Federal bureau in Washington their right to determine their own social habits and social customs; to regulate the schools in their States; to regulate the administration of charity within their States; or shall they stand for the principle of Federal assistance and local control? I have no hesitation in taking my position on that question.

Mr. President, I stated a few days ago that the proposal to centralize power in Washington was Hamiltonian and was not Jeffersonian. The statement has been made upon this floor that the Hon. Claude G. Bowers, that matchless and superb Democrat, that glorious upholder of the standards of Jackson and Jefferson and the great Democrats of the ages, stands for this bill which creates a Federal bureaucracy in Washington. I deny it.

When I heard that statement made, I knew that Mr. Bowers had never advisedly stated that he favored a new bureau in Washington. Therefore I wrote him for an expression of his views. He did not state that this portion of his reply to me was confidential. As a matter of fact, knowing the principles which Claude G. Bowers advocates; knowing the things for which he stands; knowing the political philosophy which he holds from a close study of Jeffersonian and Jacksonian Democracy, I do not believe he wants the statement made in this body that he stands for another bureaucracy in Washington to reach its tentacles out into the States of the Union and to meddle with the administration of charity. I therefore desire to read a portion of his letter, which is dated February 14:

I knew, of course, that different plans of relief had been submitted to the Senate, and I certainly did not intend to put myself in the position of a partisan to any one plan. My sole thought has been that if private charity can not prevent the terrible suffering and literal starvation, the Nation must help. I see no reason for a bureaucracy in Washington. The La Follette measure was the first offered, and I may, when it was introduced, in the absence of others have said something for it, but my intention has been to confine myself wholly to the idea that the Nation must help.

With those views of Mr. Claude G. Bowers I am in thorough and hearty accord. I have never voiced on this floor any other opinion. I have never expressed any other belief.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask the Senator, if it is all right for the Federal Government to furnish the money for this relief, whether it is not also all right for the Federal Government to control the administration and distribution of those funds.

Mr. BLACK. I am very glad the Senator asks that question. It is a very pertinent inquiry. As a matter of fact it shows the different theories of political philosophy which I have insisted exist.

I assume that it would be perfectly all right with those who entertain the theory just expounded in the question of the Senator from Iowa to have the Federal Government raise money for the public schools of his State and to determine, as was sought to be done at the last session of Congress, all matters with reference to admission into those schools; the hours of meeting in those schools; the method of teaching the pupils; and determining who should attend those schools. I do not subscribe to that doctrine.

I assume that under the Senator's opinion, as evidently manifested by his question, he favors——

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield further to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLACK. Let me answer the Senator's question and then I shall be delighted to have him ask another one. I assume that under the Senator's question it is perfectly satisfactory to him for the Federal Government to supply the money to aid the distressed in his State and to have his people aided by regulations prescribed by a bureau in Washington. It is not satisfactory to the people of my State.

I assume that it would be perfectly satisfactory to the Senator from Iowa, carrying his theory to its ultimate conclusion, to permit, as was permitted in this bill in the beginning of the discussion, a bureau in Washington to veto the appointment of officials and the people who are to administer charity in his State. It would not be satisfactory to the people of my State.

It is simply a difference between two conflicting theories of government. There are some who believe the people are capable of ruling and should be permitted to rule. There are others who do not so believe. There are others who pin their faith to bureaus. They think when a bureau once gets its hands on anything, it can not make a mistake, that its judgments are infallible.

The issue in this case is not, as was stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], whether we want to help the hungry, but the issue is whether we want to create a new Federal bureau in Washington for some purpose. If that were not true, the amendment which has heretofore been suggested in this body, which would have provided food for the hungry people of the Nation, would have been accepted.

Why, Mr. President, we present a bill which provides for food for the hungry, which under its very terms provides that food within 10 days. The measure now before us provides it within 60 days after the bureau, with a bureau's delays, has passed upon the rules and regulations for the administration of charity throughout the Nation.

Speed! Who ever heard of any speed from a Government bureau? There is not a Senator within the sound of my voice who has not had experience enough with bureaus in the city of Washington, far removed from the people and their needs, and with thousands of clerks busily engaged in reading paper reports, who does not know that there is no chance to obtain any quick relief through a Federal bureau.

A question would come up about the administration of funds in Alabama or in Wisconsin or in Colorado. The representatives of some powerful nation-wide organization would come to Washington to see the bureau and would say, "We do not like the method used in the administration of charity in Alabama or Wisconsin or Colorado." Listening, as bureaus frequently do, to the siren voice of groups that are supposed to have votes, we would be instructed down in Alabama exactly how to administer charity among our people and how and in what manner we must conduct our social relations among ourselves. I deny that any Federal bureau has any right or should have such rights.

If I thought that all good was wrapped up in bureaus; if I believed that only the politically appointed agents of bureaus in Washington had any intelligence; if I believed that the politically appointed agents of the bureaus in Washington had more sense than have the people in Alabama and knew more about Alabama's affairs than do the people of Alabama, then I would favor the administration of all Alabama's affairs by a Washington bureau.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. It may be, Mr. President, that the Senator from Iowa is of the opinion——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLACK. I will yield in just a moment. It may be true that the Senator from Iowa is of the opinion that the bureaus in Washington, politically appointed, have more intelligence and know more about administering the affairs of the people of Iowa than do the people of Iowa. I am not so familiar with the people of Iowa as I am with the people of Alabama; but I deny that the bureau chiefs in Washington have any more intelligence, any more honesty, any more integrity, and any more knowledge of Alabama's affairs than do the citizens of my State. Now, I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will ask the Senator if he does not think if the Democrats win the next election, they will go down into Alabama and come out into Iowa and pick men to fill these bureaus and to administer them in the interest of the people?

Mr. BLACK. I will say to the Senator that I am sure that a politically appointed Democratic bureau would come nearer representing the plain, average, common, everyday man than a politically appointed bureau of a Republican President. I do not deny that, because I think the Democrats, standing as they do for the people and the right of the people to run their own government, come nearer representing the plain, average, everyday American citizen than does a government of concentrated wealth and federalized centralization.

Mr. President, the statement has been made on this floor—I do not know why—that some people have been indicted in Alabama. Under the constitution of Alabama and under the Constitution of the United States there is a provision which has been put there on account of the shed blood of patriots, that a man shall be presumed innocent until a jury of his peers have passed on the alleged offense. I know that those who believe that bureaus are all wise would perhaps prefer to have their guilt or innocence passed upon by bureaus in Washington. I do not.

In what I say I desire it to be understood that I am not passing upon the guilt or innocence of those in my State who have been indicted. I assume that they are entitled to that presumption which comes to every man in this country that he is innocent until he is proved guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. But since that question has been brought up, permit me to say that in the county where the indictments have been brought the matter was handled by a Federal bureau. Permit me to state further that I have been informed by the gentlemen who have been in charge of the prosecution that if the Federal bureau in Columbia, S. C., hundreds of miles away, had been administered as it would have been administered in the place where the incident occurred, the facts which have been developed recently would have been developed in 1929. That is the manner in which I would expect a bureau to act in connection with administering charity. It has taken from 1929 until 1932 to discover that there is sufficient evidence as alleged in a bureau in Columbia to indict a man charged with a crime in Alabama.

Now, Mr. President, since this question has come up, let me read a statement of a Federal bureau chieftain with reference to what has happened where a governmental matter was handled by local citizens. The statement is in a news item which I happened to find on my desk. It is from the Florence (Ala.) Times-News:

> A. J. Herrington, district field agent for the farmers seed loan office at Memphis, who is in charge of collection of the Government drought loans for Lauderdale, as well as several other counties in north Alabama, was in the district several days last week, G. B. Phillips, Lauderdale County agent, stated to-day.
> While in the county he released the information that out of $50,000 loaned to 326 Lauderdale farmers last year the records show there is less than $1,000 remaining unpaid or for which adequate collateral has not been given. He also stated that Lauderdale probably heads the list of counties in Alabama in so far as repayment of the loans is concerned, based on the amount of money which was loaned to the number of loans granted.
> Mr. Phillips stated this morning that the above facts were due in a large measure to the efficient cooperation of the community committees who passed on the applications of each farmer, and to the county committee composed of Probate Judge H. L. Stutts, Andrew J. Darby, and H. F. Koonce.

Mr. President, with reference to the statement that this appropriation, if made, will absolutely prevent malnutrition, let me say that, if made, there will be $125,000,000 available between now and July 1. It is estimated that there are 8,300,000 people out of employment; it is reasonable to assume, as some have, that there are from 25,000,000 to 40,000,000 of the unemployed and their dependents. Assuming that there are 25,000,000, the amount available would be equivalent to $5 for each individual between now and July 1. Of course, when I say $5 each I forget the fact that a first lien upon the funds is the expense of the Federal bureau uselessly set up in Washington.

Mr. President, there can be no mistaking this issue; it is plain. It is not a question of whether we want to vote to help people who are starving. Everyone knows that if this bill should pass this body it would likely never become a law. I am not interested in issues. What I am interested in is doing something that will feed the people, and everybody knows that this bill will not feed them, because everyone knows it will not become a law.

In the next place, everyone knows further that those who may be in need would have to depend upon the tender mercies of a Washington bureau. They know that if a question came up in their State, they would have to appeal through various channels, through a subbureau in some other State, and through the next regional bureau on until the appeal finally came to Washington, and then multitudinous clerks, looking over piles of papers mountain high, would finally reach a conclusion that probably the poor individual claimant (who in the meantime would have starved to death), was not entitled to relief. They would notify his administrator that the bureau in Washinton had looked into the case and it was determined that the bureau could not grant relief to the individual.

If there is a real desire to secure a measure which will have a chance of passing, which will give relief; if the real object is not the creation of a Federal bureau, let those who believe in relief unite together, and they can pass legislation. I deny that anyone has any right to charge that those of us over here who favor relief but who favor it in the good old-fashioned American method are holding up relief. I will tell you, Mr. President, who is holding up relief. It is those who stubbornly and tenaciously hold to the one idea, "You have got to take this bill and have it crammed down your throat, and you have got to take it with a bureau in Washington or everything will be defeated."

In so far as I am concerned, let it be known, it makes little difference with me whether the money is loaned to the State or given to the State, if for the purposes of relief. It will be noted that when I first offered the substitute I provided $375,000,000 for highway construction which was not to be matched. That showed no tender solicitude for the high Federal income taxpayers of this country. I have been trying to get such a bill through for four years. I have been insisting—and I shall continue to insist—that the Federal Government owes a greater duty to the States than merely to let them have some money which the States will match. I offered that bill heretofore. My amendment has been bodily taken verbatim and attached to the La Follette-Costigan bill, which provides for a Federal bureau. Much as I regret to vote against my own amendment, now incorporated in the pending bill, a measure, the enactment of which I have been trying to secure for years, I can not bring myself to the conclusion that I am justified in playing upon the misery which exists in this country in order to secure the enactment of legislation to create a new bureau, with new powers heretofore undreamed of in the philosophy of centralization.

There is one thing about centralization to which I wish to refer. I called attention to this point the other day, and I want to call attention to it again; and then, I think, I am through. In the first place, I desire to state that, in my judgment, the unemployment insurance bill which was signed last week by Governor La Follette, of the State of Wisconsin, providing for security for workmen, the cost paid out of industrial funds and not to bear down on the backs of the farmers of the country, is one of the most far-reaching innovations and reforms that have occurred in this country within a century.

I favor an added security to those who have served their country well. I favor an added security of employment. I favor strengthening the laws of this country to provide for it, because the time has come when men should be treated as men, and when we know that unless some sort of security is given them they have no chance in this turmoil of industrial activity. But, Mr. President, I favor those reforms coming as exalting work. I do not want to turn aside the social forces of this country from that direction into the direction of exalting idleness, shiftlessness, and vice. I desire the great social movements which are in progress all over this broad land of ours to find themselves in a strong and steady stream and current, turning the people more and more toward the realization that the laborer is worthy of his hire and away from the manipulations that take away from him who works the product of his labor, and place it in the hands of those who do not toil.

It can be done if we go right; but, in my humble judgment—and I say it with due deference to the gentlemen who are backing this measure with reference to a bureau—if they should succeed in passing this bill, and it should become a law, they would have put the greatest obstacle in the way of social reforms like old-age pensions, like unemployment insurance, and like security for the workers of this Nation, that has ever been placed in the pathway of social progress.

Why do I say that? I say that because the natural tendency of a bureau it toward immortality. It knows no end to its greed. When it has once dipped its hands in the Federal Treasury and felt the greedy touch of gold, it knows no end to its avarice and its ambition. When you have created a horde of Federal employees it is to their interest to continue and perpetuate themselves. Just as certainly as we live this movement for a new bureau, if accepted, is tending toward permanency—not permanency of employment; not permanency of the right to work; but permanency of a Federal bureau.

Mr. President, in so far as I am concerned, I find myself with not the slightest hesitation upon this measure. I state again that I favor Federal aid in these times of emergency and stress. I state again that if it does not come at this session of Congress, the blame must rest where it should; and it is squarely upon the heads of those who take the position that the only way to administer aid to the people of this Nation and to feed the hungry is to do it through a Federal bureau in Washington. Let there be no mistake about that issue.

There is perhaps not a Senator here, nor a Senator who will be on this floor when we vote, who has not inveighed all over his State against bureaus in Washington. I have on my desk an article written by one of the ablest Senators in this body, referring to the spinelessness of the House and the Senate as the Members sit here and, as a result of the activities of certain social workers who appear before us, permit the sacred rights of the people to be taken away from them by Federal bureaus. I deny that there is any question of technicality in this issue. If it were a technicality, there would not be such reluctance to yield on the point of a Federal bureau by the champions of the pending bill.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. Under this bill, as I understand, about $16,000,000 will go to Alabama. Is the Senator going to refuse to receive that amount of money just because it is handled by some bureaucrat that he does not like?

Mr. BLACK. I am glad the Senator asked that question. The Senator says that under this bill about $16,0000,000 would go to Alabama. I have read the bill carefully many times. Let me say that it depends upon the whim and caprice of a bureau in Washington whether or not one dollar ever finds it way into the Democratic State of Alabama.

Let the facts speak for themselves. There has never been a bureau created in Washington that was not political.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. If that is all the trouble with the bill, would it not be perfectly easy for the Senator from Alabama to offer an amendment that would make it mandatory that he should get his $16,000,000?

Mr. BLACK. I will state to the Senator that it is apparently sacrilegious for any Senator to lay his hands upon this holy measure. It is sacrosanct. It must be taken as it is. No, Mr. President; if it were desired to get this money and feed the hungry, there has been a measure here which would have given it to the people in 10 days. This one requires 60 days after a bureau investigation.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. BLACK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. Is it not true that this "holy bill" takes half of the total amount, the amount authorized for road purposes, right out of the Senator's own amendment?

Mr. BLACK. That is correct; because it evidently was deemed wise to do that. The Senator, before that time, had expressed himself as favoring a road amendment; and since it was in our bill it was probably thought that the Senator might not vote for the bill without it. I do not know that, of course. Anyhow, that is in the bill.

What I state is this:

There are enough Democrats on this side of the aisle who favor feeding the hungry to join hands with those Republicans who likewise favor feeding the hungry if they will abandon the position that the only way it can be done is through a Federal bureau at Washington.

Let there be no mistake about that issue. It is plain. I make the statement here and now that if no legislation passes in this body to feed the hungry and to place clothing upon the naked, it will be due entirely to those who demand that they be fed and clothed by the hands of a Federal bureau of experts rather than fed and clothed by the people of the several States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] and I have jointly introduced again as an original bill, and have had sent to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, a measure which provides $375,000,000 for the purposes set out in the pending bill; but which, of course, does not recognize that the proper way to administer the fund is through a Federal bureau. It also provides that $375,000,000 shall be utilized for good roads.

Whenever there is an abandonment of the idea of the creation of this huge bureau in Washington, with its powers extending into every State in this Union, then we can pass legislation; but in so far as I am concerned I am not willing to leave to any political bureau in Washington, first, the right to say in what States the money shall be spent and in what States it shall not be spent. That is the first thing. This all-powerful bureau could take away every dime of this money which is supposed to go to Alabama and send it to any other State. Politics could easily enter in. Secondly, I claim that the people of my State have intelligence enough and honesty enough to determine for themselves how they will administer charity. I deny that any bureau in Washington has the right to pass on what we are giving the people and say whether we shall give more or give less. I deny that any bureau in Washington has a right to tell the people of the 48 States who shall administer charity. I deny that any bureau in Washington should be given the right, as is incorporated in this bill, to provide that if the State does not supervise properly the private charitable institutions such as churches, community chests, fraternal orders, and labor unions that would be selected to distribute this money, this Washington bureau should have the right to withdraw funds from that State and never give to it another dollar of the money which was appropriated for charity in that State.

I deny that a Federal bureau should be given this power. I deny that it should be given the broad and all-comprehensive power conferred in section 11. This section provides as follows: After a certificate for the money has been issued, the guntlet of the Chief of the Children's Bureau must be run; then the board; and if the certificate has been issued to the Secretary of the Treasury, the bureau may then say that my State, because forsooth it does not meet the demands of social experts or political experts in Washington, can have the money withdrawn from the State.

Let those who choose to do so say this is a technical objection. Let them stand upon that; but if they say it is technical, and they have not accepted the bill which would feed the hungry and clothe the naked, let it be known that upon them, and upon them alone, rests the burden of denying food to the hungry and clothing to the naked.

The statement has been made that there is no difference between this measure and the rules with reference to the highway system. There is a big difference. In the first place, in the case of the highway system we are dealing with highways. They are inanimate. In this case we are dealing with the most sacred relationships of human life. We are going into the homes of the poor and the unfortunate, and we are going there in the right way or in the wrong way. We are going into the homes of people whose children perhaps are emaciated with hunger.

We have been going there in my State through the community chests, through the churches, through the boards of county commissioners, through the city commissioners. They know these people. They know their needs. They know their necessities. If this pending bill becomes a law, however, in order for us to meet the fastidious demands of the bureau in Washington, which we might meet and we might not, we must agree that these local organizations will administer relief exactly as they are directed by the experts in Washington.

Think of that! A Washington expert in the administration of charity in Wisconsin! Yet under this bill the Chief of the Children's Bureau is given the power to hire experts to minister to the hungry and the sick and the weak, and the people of the States are denied the right to minister to their own citizens in their own way.

Mr. President, let there be no mistake. I favor using the taxing power of the Federal Government to aid the distressed in this Nation, but I do not favor permitting a Federal bureau in Washington to come into the various States of this Union and then say exactly how they must proceed. It is dictatorial. It is tyrannical. It is destructive of the most sacred right of American citizens. It undermines their character. It takes away from them the responsibility for the administration of their own affairs.

If there be any real desire in this body to pass legislation, let it be shown by striking out the provision for the Federal bureau or let it be known that upon those who demand this or nothing must fall the burden of the failure of Congress to come to the succor of the sick, the needy, the hungry, the cold, and the starving of this Nation. Do not try to shift the responsibility. It can not be shifted.

If those who demand a Federal bureau or nothing desire to join with those who want no bill and defeat a piece of legislation which would have the hungry fed in the old-fashioned American method by their neighbors and friends, then let them take the responsibility for defeating the legislation, because there is where it will lie. No eloquence, no logic, no skill, and no cunning can evade the issue. It is upon those who say, "If the hungry are to be fed, we demand that they be fed by the bureau that we have set up in our way. If you will not feed them in our way, let them starve! Let them freeze! A Federal bureau must be had, and the freezing and the hungry can not be ministered to unless they are ministered to under the plans of a Federal bureau in Washington."

No, Mr. President; it seems to me that if we wanted properly to entitle this bill with reference to the Federal bureau it would be entitled, "A bill to feed hungry politicians and hungry workers who want a job with the Federal bureau in Washington." They are the first who are mentioned in it.

There are 31 men on this side, as I understand, who voted for Federal relief. As I understand it, there are 13 or 14 on the other side who want to vote for Federal relief. They would constitute a majority. What is standing between them is very simple—a Federal bureau. We claim, and we assert, that our experience with Federal bureaus has been too disastrous to cede to them any more power.

Why should not the minority that wants Federal aid for the hungry yield to the wishes of the majority and feed the hungry? About 45 men here seem to be ready to vote for Federal assistance to the hungry, and the editorial said the issue was, "Let the hungry be fed." They can be fed. This $375,000,000 can be voted for them. There is no difficulty about it. We all know it will not ever be voted if you stick to your Federal bureau. Nobody doubts that. But it can be voted if those who have set up this bureau and have said, "Take it or nothing," are more interested in feeding the hungry and clothing the naked than they are in the establishment of this huge new bureau here with dictatorial powers. Before the clock strikes 10 to-night we can pass a bill providing $375,000,000 to feed the hungry and clothe the naked.

Mr. President, if it has to be done at the price of a Federal bureau—with its red tape, with its multitude of papers, its members sitting in some secluded office in Washington, far removed from the man who is suffering the pangs of hunger, which never sees the look of anguish on the face of the man who is cold, but gets a report through the various channels on a piece of paper and then reads the paper and passes on the right of the cold and hungry citizen—then they will never get any relief. Bureaus are not famous for expedited action.

I plead with those who desire to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked, and who believe that this $375,000,000 will be very valuable to do that, to surrender the idea of a Federal bureau and admit for once that all wisdom is not contained under the shelter of the numerous offices which house thousands and thousands of clerks who wear their eyes out in reading papers and passing upon paper cases.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, after listening to the splendid remarks of my friends the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] about the merits of local self-government, I have concluded that I shall have to get my remarks against prohibition copyrighted in order to keep them from being plagiarized.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, it had not been my intention to trespass again on the time of the Senate, and I shall do so for but a moment. It appears proper before this prolonged debate is concluded to make a final appeal particularly to Members on this side of the Chamber to support the pending measure.

Only one or two observations made in the discussion this afternoon will be mentioned. It has been suggested that the proponents of the pending bill ought to get behind some other proposal. Not very long ago one of the best-known Senators on the other side of the Chamber is reported to have been asked if he stood behind a particular candidate for high public office. The Senator replied, in substance, that if the particular candidate would stand still long enough, he could answer the question more accurately. Throughout this day we have been confronted by suggestion after suggestion, amendments, substitute proposals, and other efforts of one sort or another, all designed to modify or defeat the pending bill. It is pertinent to inquire behind which of the alternatives the advocates of the reported measure should have ranged themselves in order to satisfy their critics.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Rather, Mr. President, in an effort to agree upon something.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, there has never been any disposition on the part of the coauthors of this measure to decline to agree on a suitable human relief measure. Efforts to sabotage the pending bill were carried on in secret before they were manifest on this floor. As stated earlier in this debate, neither the Senator from Wisconsin nor myself was called into the conferences which preceeded the introduction of the substitute.

Surely it would have been more seemly had the Members of the Senate who undertook to prepare substitute proposals come to us, after our service for the Senate on the Committee on Manufactures, in their pursuit of other legislation with which to deal with our admitted national emergency.

It has been said this afternoon that there will be no difficulty in the way of a settlement of this contested question if there is a surrender on the part of certain advocates of this legislation of some control over the appropriated Federal funds. If there is anyone here who is of the opinion that an adjournment of this session will lead to affirmative legislation which will be acceptable to the majority of this body, I am sure the Senator from Wisconsin will join with me in favoring such an adjournment. But I venture to say—and I think I know to-day's temper of the Senate—that there is no disposition on the part of the majority of this body to favor such distribution of funds from the Federal Treasury as will leave no Federal supervision over or regulation of such distribution. "Pork barrel" legislation, the wanton waste of public money, scandals in administration are not at this time desired by a majority of the Members of this Senate.

Mr. President, this debate has covered a wide range. In the beginning we were met with approving suggestions—and the compliments to the Committee on Manufactures were paid on both sides of this body—that the accumulated evidence is conclusive. The evidence of national need is conceded to be overwhelming. Men and women are needlessly dying, and countless helpless children are going hungry to bed each night in America, even while we sit here debating the particular methods to be employed in dealing with the problem.

Scarcely had these compliments been uttered before a change of front was executed. It was in this next chapter first intimated, then urged, that not until the governors of the different States directly appealed to the Federal Government for national aid should the Congress act. This attitude, however, soon shifted and, as repeated this afternoon, a third position was quickly taken. It was, apparently with complete assurance, affirmed that under no circumstances would the pending measure be approved by the White House.

Then, to crown this discussion, the contention was urged that in approaching the difficulties here to be resolved we should allow no technicalities to stand in the way. The intimation that the Senator from Wisconsin and the coauthor of this bill have been raising technicalities is somewhat humorous. If technicalities are not to stand in the way, then let the gentlemen who raise them, especially those, I regret to say, on this side of the Chamber, withdraw their objections, and let us do something without delay for the men, women, and children of America.

It would be possible for me to pile higher and higher the record in this case, but that is not my intention. At this hour let it suffice to make reference to one or two letters and a telegram before me, not included in any prior discussion.

Before me is a letter from the Governor of Montana, who voices strongly and affirmatively his support "of the Costigan-La Follette bill."

Here also is a copy of a recent telegram sent to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], in which the governor of that State clearly indicates that the situation in Minnesota points to the imminent need of Federal relief. Permit me to add a word about Illinois. Last Saturday night I spoke jointly in this city with the gifted Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] in broadcast addresses. At that time public invitation was extended for comment by listeners on what was then and there said by the respective speakers. My office at this hour is flooded with responsive messages from all parts of the Nation pathetically describing the similar distressing conditions which prevail in all parts of this country. I shall not trouble Senators even with a summary of these responses, but merely refer to one or two responsible statements thus received from the State of Illinois. One of the leading, rarely public-spirited women of Chicago wired immediately after the debate as follows:

> Senator GLENN's statement [referring to part of his broadcast discussion] is inaccurate. It is true legislative action was swiftly taken when relief funds were actually exhausted, but State funds will last only a short time. Local committees have tried for months to get action from the governor and legislature. Standards of relief have been shockingly low and paid in rations and no rents have been paid since early January. The suffering has been and is beyond telling.

I received to-day a letter from a well-known member of the General Assembly of Illinois, which, in part, reads as follows:

> Why, of course the United States Senate should not hesitate for a moment to pass the La Follette-Costigan relief measure and to aid unemployment. What our own Senator GLENN says is true. We members of the legislature did pass a relief appropriation of $20,000,000 to care for the distressed, and when it only received 73 votes in the house roll call, Senator GLENN's good friend, the Republican speaker of the house, Hon. David Shanahan, made the most eloquent appeal ever heard on the floor of the house. He told the members of the house that unless this was done, it would be necessary for the governor to send troops to Chicago, as the mayor now requests. Then, and not until then, did the members of the house pass the appropriation.
> It is now necessary to sell these bonds to the patriotic citizens of Chicago, as there is no market for the sale of these securities.
> As the representative of the largest district in the State of Illinois, I urgently request that you appeal to the Members of the United States Senate and especially to the Hon. JAMES HAMILTON LEWIS—

To whom, permit me to say, I handed this letter for inspection a few moments ago—> to enact this legislation. Also assure my good friend Senator GLENN that if he had heard the representatives of the Red Cross, Salvation Army, United Charities, Jewish, Catholic, and many other patriotic organizations who appeared before our body at Springfield last week, he would follow the leadership of the Senator from Colorado before it is to late. Thank you and Senator GLENN for your most interesting views on this great question of public policy.

Mr. President, I shall say but one further word. It was prophesied at the outset of this debate that it would prove one of the most fundamental which has ever absorbed this distinguished body, since it relates to nothing less than the right to life. The event has justified that prediction. The Senators from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY], New York [Mr. WAGNER], Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] on this side of the Chamber and the Senators from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and California [Mr. JOHNSON] on the other side have persuasively sounded the loftiest note of American patriotism during their respective discussions. Indeed, not more effectively did Demosthenes "fulmine" over ancient Greece than the Senators from Idaho and California across America in the last few days in behalf of suffering humanity. Inspired by such living examples, I do not hesitate to appeal to followers of Jefferson and Wilson here and to followers of Lincoln and Roosevelt there to support this imperatively needed, essentially American legislation.

I venture to add that while some Members of this body may perhaps be better nurtured in what they are pleased to term the old Democracy, I speak with some assurance of the spirit of the new Democracy of America; and it may be affirmed without hesitation that there are resources in that new Democracy which will find a way to authorize new voices as its spokesmen unless the pending measure is enacted.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can well understand that Senators on the other side of the aisle who have had no particular interest in this subject should be anxious to have an early vote and adjournment. I labor under no delusions as to the ultimate fate of the bill.

To me it is amazing that so many Senators who have listened to the able arguments presented by the Senators from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] have failed to be impressed by the amount of misery in the country. Yet frankness compels me to say that I hold in my hand telegrams and letters from great numbers of chambers of commerce in my State protesting against the enactment of the legislation.

I should not be true to the people in the 79 bread lines in my city if I did not express sympathy for the legislation, and to say very briefly what I can to urge its enactment.

We have in the schools of my city a million school children. Three-quarters of them live in the tenements. I should not be true to those tenement children if I did not do what I can to pass the bill. I should not be true to the mothers who live in the tenements if I did not do what I can to further this legislation.

Mr. President, have you ever been in the slums of a great city? Have you ever seen people living under conditions which ought not to be possible in a civilized country? Have you ever gone into the basement or the subbasement of a tenement house and seen living in one room 6 or 8 or even 9, and in one instance I saw 11 persons? What happens to them when unemployment is as common as it is now? What happens to them when the little income which they had is entirely wiped out? Mr. President, you know what happens. It means undernourishment, rickets, tuberculosis, and early death. I should not be true to those families if I did not say a word in behalf of the pending measure.

But, Mr. President, in my State this condition of distress is not confined to the dwellers of the city. I have here three letters, and I am going to quote a paragraph from each one of them. These letters come from farm homes in the State of New York. Senators do not often think of New York as a rural State or a farming State, and yet we stand eighth in agriculture of the country.

Here is a letter from the Genessee Valley, one of the richest and finest farming countries in the whole world. The writer says:

> As one of your constituents, I wish to petition you to be mindful of the deplorable financial condition of the farmers here in western New York State known as the "garden of the world." Fine, abundant crops in 1931 sold at far less than the cost of production; receipts were less than cost. Few have money to pay present taxes now due and many are so heavily in debt their credit is impaired or totally destroyed.

From another farm home:

> I am asking for information how a farmer can obtain a loan from the new Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

There will be a lot of people asking about that, but the purpose of that act was not to relieve the farmer. The purpose of that act was to give a dole to the bankers and the railroads of the country. But this poor man wants to know how he can get a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. He continues:

> It is almost impossible for any farmer to get money from the banks, and yet they seem to have plenty of money, according to their quarterly statements. We farmers have got to have help to get on our feet. Farm after farm is being left or abandoned because the farmers can not obtain money to carry them on. What to do we do not know.

Another letter, from a widow on a farm home in western New York State:

> Within a radius of 4 miles from us I have counted 29 of the best farms possible where the farmers have lost their places and several more who will do so this spring. If war were declared, the President and all other officials would meet the needs promptly, and now, as I see it, the President is only interested in the bankers. All the banks and everything else will stop if the farmers' interests are not promptly protected—and Mr. Hoover got the majority of their votes, too. My family and I are stanch Republicans, but are not promising to remain so. We are hard-working farmers, and I have worked on the farm to save hiring until I broke down in health, and the terrible sacrifices which we are compelled to submit to can not be described with pen and paper.

Mr. President, I should not be true to the farmers of my State unless I raised my voice for this legislation.

Cities have been unable to raise the money needed for local relief. The reason why this bill is necessary is because of the attitude of the bankers. They have not been willing to assist the cities in financing their operations so that they could carry on the work of relief necessary to prevent starvation and human suffering.

These bankers are ever alert. I hold in my hand a news dispatch, dated New York, January 30, and this is what it says:

> NEW YORK, January 30.—Demands by banking interests that he abandon plans for reduction in electric-light rates were said today to have brought about the resignation Wednesday of Matthew S. Sloan as president of the New York Edison Co.

A humane man, finding that the revenue of his company was great enough to justify a reduction in electric-light rates, is forced out of his position because the bankers are unwilling to have any reduction in the revenue which they may get from the operation of that great concern.

Mr. President, the same group—the superbanking group—are raising all the time the cry of the "dole." I have heard it repeated time and time again in this debate, statements to the effect that the dole would be a dreadful thing. If we come to the dole in the United States of America—and I hope we never shall—it will be because the great industrialists and the great bankers of the country are unwilling to reorganize their activities in such a way that the man who works with his hands will have some share of the gravy of life. I am not distressed about the cry of the "dole." I am more interested in the question of how we are going to preserve, first, the health and the lives of our people, and, secondly, Mr. President, how we are going to preserve our country against an aroused populace.

Why should we hesitate to use this word or to think about it? Men in very high places have not hesitated to speak about the dangers of revolution. Why do we think our country is so secure? Men will not starve, Mr. President; men will not permit their families to starve. There is no end to what desperate men will do in the face of economic distress.

We are too sheltered in Washington; we are too remote from the human side of life; here we appear to live on a higher plane. One can not walk down the streets of New York or those of any other industrial city without having aroused in his heart and mind the determination to do what he can to do away with the causes of distress in those communities.

Mr. President, I am not interested in the question of the political philosophy involved in this bill so much as I am in the hope and expectation that through its operations may come relief of human suffering. I am sorry the substitute bill was not adopted; I think it was a far better measure in many respects than the bill on which we are about to vote. But no matter who may administer this measure, no matter what the control may be, no matter in whose charge it may be, it is mere sophistry to say that there will be any failure of honest and prompt operation.

O Mr. President, I wish I had the power to put before the eyes of Senators the picture of human suffering which I have seen within a very few days, having spent the last week end in New York City. I want Senators to realize that there are thousands upon thousands, and, I suppose, literally millions of men, women, and children in this country who are not getting enough to eat, whose clothing is rapidly falling into rags, and many of whom are dispossessed from their homes. Are we going to stand here and argue against a measure which has in it any hope of relief just because it does not happen to suit us?

Let me say to the Senators from Colorado and Wisconsin that there will be as just criticism of us on this side if we shall fail to vote for the bill now pending because it does not suit us, as there will be criticism that can be passed upon the authors of the bill for insisting that the bill must be in a form to suit them.

For myself, Mr. President, I do not care what method of administration may be provided. I seek only a means of relief, so far as we can give it, to the poor people of America who are deprived of local assistance largely by selfish men. I beg Senators on this side that they will not permit any political theory to prevent them casting their votes for this measure, because, as I see it, we have reached the point now where it is this measure of relief or no measure of relief. I beg of Senators in behalf of the suffering children, of the hungry parents, and all those who are in misery, to cast their votes for this measure of relief.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, in spite of two weeks of debate, it seems evident that this bill is about to die, but there is hope, because there will be a to-morrow; there is hope because the bitterness of this debate will be ended to-night. The conference which should have been held by those who favor this bill has not taken place. It will commence to take place to-morrow, and a majority of this body, being in favor of relief legislation and differing possibly only as to methods as to the control by bureaus, and so forth, will speedily enact relief legislation.

I think it is pitiable, I think it is tragic, that so much time should have been taken up with oratory while distress and suffering have been growing more acute. I do not mean by that to criticize those who have brought the facts before this body, for they did a good work, and I think the facts are known; but how can those who favor this measure conceive that it could ever become a law? Even if it should pass this body and pass the other House it seems inevitable that it would be vetoed.

We know the attitude of the President of the United States, because he has expressed it time and again on similar measures. We have heard the speech of the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], one of the leaders on the other side. We heard him say that he thought he understood the attitude of the President of the United States, and I have no doubt he does. I think the 31 regular Republican Senators on the other side who voted against the substitute and who will in a few minutes vote against this bill know the attitude of the President of the United States. What a futile thing it is for us to fight here to pass a bill when there is every indication that it will be vetoed, and we know, or will know in a few minutes, that there is not a two-thirds vote in this body to pass the bill over the presidential veto.

Let me analyze, for instance, the vote on the substitute. There were 78 votes cast; there were 27 Democratic votes on this side cast for a relief measure identical to that now pending except as to the method of administration. There are, as I calculate—and I think the estimate will probably turn out to be correct—only 17 Republicans on the other side who are in favor of the pending measure. If I am mistaken, the vote will so indicate in a few minutes. There are in this body out of the 78 votes cast 17 Republicans and 27 Democrats who favor the relief proposed by the two measures which have been under consideration. There are in this body, out of the 78 votes cast, 31 Republicans and 4 or 5 Democrats—I think 5—who are opposed to any relief of this character and kind.

The situation is perfectly plain. Legislation of this character has been impossible of enactment from the very beginning; and yet, instead of those who constitute a fair majority of this body getting together and attempting to unite on some other measure, they have wasted their time, and all the while the 31 Republicans on the other side who are opposed to any legislation whatever have enjoyed the situation.

Now the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has introduced as an original bill the substitute which received 31 votes in this body but did not receive a single vote of the 17 progressive Senators on the Republican side, who will probably be the only supporters of the La Follette bill on that side. The bill which has just been introduced by the Senator from Alabama will undoubtedly go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is a member of that committee. His bill now contains the road provision which was in the original substitute. The introduction of the bill by the Senator from Alabama will afford an opportunity to reach a compromise; and from what I have heard of this debate, it seems to me that there ought to be some common ground—not for all those who support it, but for a sufficient number of those who support it—to enable them to pass a bill through this body and at the same time possibly avoid a veto. I do not know as to that, but I hope we can do so.

I know that when we were dealing with the veterans' legislation we were very careful to conform to the President's wishes so as to avoid a veto, and I hope we can pursue a like course now. Is it not possible that we can ascertain positively the views of the President on this subject? Is it not possible that in a matter of this importance he will discuss with the leaders what position he takes? I notice that a large body of labor leaders called on the President of the United States with regard to this matter. What did he tell them? Did he give them any encouragement? If so, let us know what it is. What has he told any of the advocates of any of these bills? Has he given them any encouragement? If he has not, then his past attitude, unless he should change his position and become inconsistent, would insure a veto of this measure.

I sincerely hope that to-morrow morning all those who favor this kind of legislation will meet in open and free conference and ascertain whether or not there can not be reached a compromise that will bring a majority, at least, of this body behind some measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am very much surprised and very deeply grieved that the sentiments expressed this afternoon appear to be quite general among quite a number of Senators in this Chamber. There seems to be some hidden feeling, some bitterness in the minds and the hearts of some Senators, because of things that have happened and votes that have taken place in this body on this bill.

I was not aware of that until to-day. Until to-day I had no knowledge that there was any feeling, that there was any jealousy, or that there was any sentiment of this kind. I supposed every man here was voting his sentiments. I had no idea that it was within my province to criticize any man for any vote he had cast, although I might differ from him very greatly. Even those who are opposed to any legislation made what seemed to me on the face of it a very logical argument; and those who disagree as to what we should do to bring relief to an admittedly terrible condition ought, it seems to me, to search their own hearts now. I was going to say they ought to take the beam out of their own eye, but

I do not believe there is a beam in it. I will say they ought to take the mote out of their own eye in order that they may see clearly the mote that is in their brother's eye.

Men with perfectly honest intentions, men whose hearts are moved by the evidence that has disclosed the terrible suffering that is going on in our country, are now quarreling, bitterly quarreling, over the means we are going to use to rescue those who are suffering.

It seems to me this is not a time to talk politics. It means nothing to me whether the bill has the name of a Democrat, a regular Republican, or a progressive Republican. Until to-day I had not thought that it meant anything to anybody. I have never felt that the so-called Democratic substitute came from men who were moved by anything but the most loyal and patriotic motives. I am not criticizing them for the way they prepared it or produced it or introduced it. Perhaps they made mistakes. Perhaps, from some points of view, they made serious mistakes; but nobody is perfect. Not one of us can get any legislation that suits him 100 per cent. It is always necessary to compromise; and we can not compromise rightfully unless we concede to the other fellow the same honest motives that we claim for ourselves.

I will not criticize, in my mind or in my heart, a single Senator who votes against this measure. He looks at it from one point of view, backed by a logical position which he can defend if we are inclined to be technical; but I do not agree with him. I must concede, however, that he may be right and I may be wrong. What difference does it make who proposed the legislation or who proposed amendments that have been voted down?

There has been some very courteous but I think very deep-seated criticism made to-day against those on this side of the Chamber who voted against the substitute. It has been charged that we want to have our way about it; that if the starving children and suffering people are to get relief they must get it through the methods we want, and that they will starve without it. I could make the same charge to those who now vote against this bill that is all ready to be voted on and say to them, "You are assuming the attitude that to get something you must take it our way or starve"; but I do not charge that. I will not charge that against anybody who votes against the bill. I see no reason why that intimation should be cast against anyone.

I voted against the so-called Democratic substitute. I have no apologies to make for my action. I was not moved by any political feeling, or any desire to give anybody an advantage over somebody else. I voted against it because I believed that the provisions of the regular bill were better. They suited me better. Some things in it I would not have put in it if I had drawn it. I thought at the beginning that the provision about roads ought to be added to it; and I offered that provision as an amendment, and the Senate agreed to it. In that condition I favored it over the other. If the substitute had been agreed to, I would not have felt that anybody had tried to do a trick, or anything dishonorable or disreputable. I would have supported it—wholeheartedly supported it—and would have done everything I could to see that it was enacted into law.

It is said that this bill will be vetoed. Of course, I do not know whether it will be vetoed or not; neither do I know whether it would have been vetoed if the so-called Democratic substitute had been agreed to. Who does? Is there anybody over there or over here who can tell us now that if the substitute had been agreed to it would have been signed, and that this bill as it is now will not be signed? What difference is there in that respect? I hope it will not be vetoed, but we have no way of telling whether it will be or not. All we can do is to do our duty as we see it; and the veto argument would have been just the same whether the substitute went up or went down.

Even though Senators feel that an injustice has been done to them, even though that be true, it seems to me that they should not take it out on the suffering people of the United States. It seems to me they should not let such a feeling—narrow-minded, even though justified—control their votes on an occasion of this kind.

We have all felt that way. I do not believe any one in this Chamber has felt it more keenly than I have. Because I have not agreed with my colleagues, because I have very often voted with those on the other side of the aisle, I have become almost an outcast in some quarters. I have, however, so far refused to let anybody dictate to me to what political party I should give adherence. I may be entirely wrong about it, but I believe I am right; and until I am convinced that I am not right I shall continue to occupy just such a position, unenviable and disagreeable as it sometimes is. But that fact in the Senate, and in the House before I came here, has often been the reason why my name was kept off legislation, if necessary. It has meant opposition on some important legislation that passed through the Senate and went to the House.

I think the men who take such a position as that, while, of course, they are human and may be perfectly justified, are as narrow-minded as a 2 by 4. They are not statesmen; they are just common, ordinary, petty politicians. It is disagreeable to have those things happen. Perhaps Senators feel that that has happened to them. Perhaps it has. I am not disputing it. I do not know. Assuming that it has, however, with the terrible distress and suffering that our fellow citizens are enduring, if Senators will permit the suggestion, it should not control a single vote in this Chamber at this time. The statesmanship that ought to be in the heart of every man who is worthy of a seat here ought to be more broad-minded than that; and we ought to be willing to suffer humiliation ourselves if we feel, while we are doing it, that we are giving relief to suffering humanity, and making men, women, and children happy who are now starving and suffering from cold.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BARKLEY (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I am informed that if that Senator were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BULOW (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], who is absent. If that Senator were present, I understand he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate. If my colleague were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], who is necessarily absent. I find I can transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and I do so. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). "Present."

Mr. FESS (when Mr. MOSES's name was called). I announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. If present and not paired, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is detained from the Senate in attendance on the disarmament conference at Geneva.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is detained from the Senate by illness. If present, he would vote "yea"; and I am informed that if the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF], with whom my colleague is paired, were present and permitted to vote he would vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. I understand that if that Senator were present he would vote "nay." If I were privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

PROPOSED ANTI-INJUNCTION LEGISLATION

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 935, to amend the judicial code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. HEBERT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether he will not be willing to allow us to proceed to the consideration first of Senate bill 3616, which is the emergency bank bill. The bill referred to by the Senator from Nebraska is a bill which should be considered, but this bank bill is a very urgent measure. I hope the Senator will let us proceed with it.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Nebraska will not press his motion at this time. I have explained to him the situation in which I find myself. I am anxious to be here when the bill to which he has referred is considered. I have been one of those who have worked, I may say diligently, to prepare a minority report on the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator prepared it?

Mr. HEBERT. It has been prepared and is completed, and before I take my seat, I propose to offer it in the Senate. I shall necessarily be absent for the remainder of the week, and I sincerely hope the Senator will be willing to postpone the consideration of the bill until my return. I promise him that I shall cooperate with him in any way to bring the bill before the Senate immediately after I get back to Washington on Monday.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have been importuned, since it has been known that I was going to make the motion, by quite a good many Senators, some of them members of the Committee on the Judiciary who are favorable to the bill. They have asked me not to crowd it at this time because of the reasons given by the Senator from Virginia and others, particularly the Senator from Rhode Island. I would like to accommodate the Senator from Rhode Island, because he is a member of the committee, and while he has been opposed to the legislation all the way through, he has been present at the committee meetings and has, so far as I know, never been a party with those who were trying to delay it; and I want to commend him for that, no matter how this matter may come out.

This is no new proposition, Mr. President. Perhaps I am oversensitive about it, because for the last three years the Committee on the Judiciary has been considering this kind of legislation, which was referred to a subcommittee of which I was chairman, and from the very beginning up to the present time there has been one continual clamor for delay, delay, and delay.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Nebraska will acquit me of any design in the world to interpose delay.

Mr. NORRIS. I do acquit the Senator, and I acquit the Senator from Rhode Island as well. But the bill went over from one session to another, and then from one Congress to another, the Judiciary Committee very evenly divided all the time, and never until this session was there a majority of the Committee on the Judiciary in favor of the legislation.

We have given months of our time to this measure, and it is a more or less technical proposition which requires a very great deal of study. The members of the committee, particularly of the subcommittee which really drew this bill, have spent almost unlimited time getting it ready, and every time an attempt has been made to bring it up we have been met with one excuse or another to delay it.

The bill has not passed the House. It is different from the legislation in charge of the Senator from Virginia, which has passed the House. I suppose the same tactics—and I do not mean on the part of Members of the House, but from those outside—will be interposed, people continually asking to be heard. Every time an amendment is proposed there will be a clamor to be heard, and propaganda will come from all over the United States directed to members of the committee asking that this man be heard and that this institution be heard. There will be no end to the delay. I am anxious now to get the bill up for consideration.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Would not the Senator be willing to fix a time next Monday when the bill may be brought up, so as to be absolutely sure of a fixed time?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to interfere with the plans of Senators. I am particularly anxious to accommodate the Senator from Rhode Island, who can not be here until Monday. If I can get an agreement, I would be glad to have the bill go over. In order to test the Senate, I will just submit a request now.

I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday at 2 o'clock the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 935, and that the bill be not laid aside except by unanimous consent until it is finally disposed of, that it shall remain the unfinished business until finally disposed of. If I can get that agreement, it will accommodate everybody, I think.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that on 2 o'clock next Monday Senate bill 935, to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, be made the unfinished business, and remain before the Senate until finally disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. I trust that the unanimous-consent agreement may be entered into without objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, first I want to express my appreciation of the courtesy accorded me by the Senator from Nebraska in continuing the matter until next Monday.

Secondly, I want to correct a statement which he made and by which I know he does not mean to impute to me any motives which are not laudable. He stated that I am opposed to the legislation. I was opposed to some of the provisions of the bill, but I want to say that I am not opposed to the legislation. In fact, I with other members of the committee, have prepared a substitute bill which will be brought before the Senate for consideration at the same time as the measure reported by the majority.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have just had called to my attention something I had not thought of before, and that is that next Monday is Washington's Birthday and the Senate will probably not be in session. I ask unanimous consent now to change the date from Monday until Tuesday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The agreement was reduced to writing, as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, that at the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. on Tuesday, February 23, 1932, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes; and that the same remain the unfinished business until disposed of.

Mr. HEBERT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the views of the minority to accompany the bill (S. 935) to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes, which was ordered to be printed as part 2 of Report No. 163.

EMERGENCY CREDIT EXPANSION

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture; to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator may move to proceed to the consideration of the measure, but I would object to a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. GLASS. Very well; I move to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. COUZENS. I assume that the motion is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is debatable.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the trouble with the bill is that I understand some amendments that were agreed upon in committee have been tentatively agreed to be changed by a meeting of others than the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. A situation has developed in relation to amendments to the bill that have not been considered by the committee. It is my judgment that the bill should be considered by the Banking and Currency Committee and not by a subcommittee in conjunction with others not members of the Senate. The Senator from Virginia knows to what I refer.

It has developed that the bill has been considered without taking a single word of testimony. All of the testimony that the so-called subcommittee has was received in sessions not before any regular Senate committee. I submit that the bill has not been reported out in the form in which it is now to be submitted by the Banking and Currency Committee.

While I do not desire to interpose a serious objection to taking up the bill, I do believe, in view of what has developed in the House and what has developed around the Senate, that the Banking and Currency Committee should have an opportunity to consider the bill before it is taken up by the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Replying to the remarks made by the Senator from Michigan I will say that in a technical sense the bill which I have moved shall be taken up for consideration at this time is exactly the bill that was authorized by the Banking and Currency Committee to be reported, the only alteration in the bill being made in pursuance of a motion made by the distinguished Senator from Michigan that the Senator from Virginia, myself, and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] be authorized to make a single alteration in one provision of the bill that would textually apply to the purposes for which we were assured that provision was intended; so that the bill which I have moved to have taken up is technically the exact bill that was reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency by unanimous vote.

There has been no attempt at any change in the bill. There have been proposed two amendments to the bill, one designed to clarify and to make plainer the meaning of one provision in the bill, the other being an extension of the limitation upon the terms of the bill; but that is a matter to be decided by the Senate, whether the Senate will approve the proposed clarification and whether the Senate will approve the proposed extension of the limitation.

As to there being no hearings, should we have a hearing I do not imagine that the Committee on Banking and Currency would have any better understanding of the bill than it had after my complete explanation of it. I am not felicitating myself upon my capabilities in that direction, but I gave, I think, a clear explanation of the meaning of each provision of the bill. Were we to undertake to delay matters by having open hearings, we would simply have a repetition of what occurred on the House side. The same gentlemen who appeared there would appear before our committee and make the same statements to us that they made over there and which are available to us in print.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. The testimony taken over in the House after the bill was first drafted was not taken publicly.

Mr. GLASS. Yes, I think so; all except the testimony of one gentleman, and if that gentleman should appear before the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, he again would insist upon an executive session and very likely would insist that no record of his statement be made. I may say to the Senator from Michigan that the nature of his statement was such and would be such as to render it very undesirable to make it public.

Mr. COUZENS. The point I object to is that the testimony which was taken by the House committee was heard by the members of the House Committee on Banking and Currency and undoubtedly had an influence upon them in reaching a decision upon the legislation. I submit that the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate has no such testimony. Even the Senator from Virginia, in whom the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate has great confidence, did not submit to the committee the same testimony that he received at the White House conference or the same testimony that the Banking and Currency Committee of the House received when they took up the legislation. I think the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, if they are to support the legislation, should have the same testimony that other Members have had who now want the Senate to indorse the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I insist that the Senate Banking and Currency Committee has the same testimony that the House committee had, but it not being regarded in good form to repeat everything that transpires in the White House, I insist that I stated to the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate every reason that was alleged for the adoption of the bill. We could not get any fuller information than we have now, except that given by General Dawes in secret. I think I have stated privately to the Senator from Michigan, as I have to other members of the Banking and Currency Committee, pretty much what that testimony was.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the bill is taken up this evening, I take it the Senator will not ask us to proceed with its consideration now?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no.

Mr. FLETCHER. I call attention to the fact that the House committee hearings are available and there are a few amendments to the bill which of course can be offered here, as they were offered in the House. Any amendments can be offered to the bill that may be desired.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to make a suggestion to the Senator as one who is interested in the bill. Why not take a recess now and take up this matter to-morrow at the beginning of the session of the Senate?

Mr. GLASS. Had the Senator from Nebraska been subjected to the ordeal to which the Senator from Virginia has been subjected, he would understand the reason why. I want to remain outside of a lunatic asylum as long as I can.

Mr. NORRIS. One day would not make much difference.

Mr. GLASS. It would to me.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it would to any of the Senator's fellow citizens. They would not believe it anyway.

Mr. GLASS. If anything could be gained in the way of testimony by a delay of this matter, much as I would regret it, I would submit to delay; but there is not a thing that may be said or will be said that has not already been said both in behalf of and against the provisions of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Reference has been made by the two Senators to an executive session and to the fact that some witness testified before the House committee, but under seal of secrecy. I was wondering if the bill before us is based upon secret testimony which has been given and which affected the bill and which other Senators here might not have the opportunity of understanding. It seems to me, speaking for myself only, that I would not want to vote for or against a bill the reasons for the provisions of which rest upon testimony secretly given.

Mr. GLASS. The confidential revelations made to those in charge of the bill and cautiously conveyed by them to other members of the Banking and Currency Committee as such should not be publicly made at this time.

Mr. President, I am reminded of an occurrence in the other House of Congress in 1914 when I happened to be chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of that body. It was necessary to make certain material amendments to what was known as the Vreeland-Aldrich bill because the precipitation of war in Europe made an extremely delicate and hazardous situation in the banking community of the United States. I recall the patriotic cooperation on the Republican side of the House on that occasion when Representative Mann of Illinois said a thing that I have always cherished. He said he did not understand the technical provisions of the bill presented, but he did understand the gentleman from Virginia, and upon his statement of the case he was going to vote for the bill; and he advised every Republican Member of the House to do likewise.

There are some confidential aspects of the problem now confronting us. I hope when the bill shall be taken up by the Senate in a tactful way to indicate the urgent necessity of the adoption of some such legislation as this, and I would not interpose the slightest objection in the world to delay if anything could be accomplished by delay. Therefore, with the utmost deference——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that after full consideration by the full Committee on Banking and Currency, our friend, the Senator from Michigan himself, moved to report the bill, and is it not a further fact that from that time to this the bill has not been amended in any particular whatever; it is the same bill?

Mr. GLASS. It has been amended in no particular, except the change which was made upon the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; and is it not a further fact that in the committee our friend from Michigan himself moved that the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] be appointed a subcommittee to write in an amendment, and that that amendment was adopted?

Mr. GLASS. I have so stated, Mr. President, but I do not think anything may be gained by reproaching one another with any degree of inconsistency.

Mr. WATSON. No; nobody is inconsistent at all, but here is the point about it: As I gather from the Senator from Michigan, he thinks that the bill has been amended somehow or other.

Mr. GLASS. No; it has not been.

Mr. WATSON. The bill has not been amended.

Mr. GLASS. Let us be frank about that. Two amendments have been proposed to the bill.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. One of them, as I have said, merely to clarify a certain phase of it, to which I think nobody could object; the other to remove a limitation that had been proposed or will be proposed.

Mr. WATSON. But they have not been proposed to the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. They have not been proposed to the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly not.

Mr. GLASS. But they will be proposed to the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly. So that the bill is necessarily in the same condition and in the same phraseology as when it left the committee.

Mr. GLASS. Absolutely.

Mr. WATSON. Exactly.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia will yield, I do not want to get into any controversy as to the facts, but I deny the statement made by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. What statement does the Senator deny?

Mr. COUZENS. I deny the statement that I moved to report the bill.

Mr. WATSON. Nobody else did.

Mr. COUZENS. I make the statement that I made the proposal that the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Delaware prepare an amendment to define a country bank.

Mr. WATSON. That is right.

Mr. COUZENS. When that motion was carried the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Virginia drew the amendment, which is now in the bill. It defines a country bank as a bank with a capitalization limited to $500,000. Since that was published hundreds of telegrams have come in protesting against the $500,000 limitation. The Senator from Ohio will agree with that statement, as will the Senator from Virginia, I think, and also the Senator from Delaware. One of the points I am trying to make is that the committee never passed upon $500,000 as being the limit of a bank's capitalization in order to come within the definition of a country bank.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. Just a moment, if the Senator will yield further. It has also developed that since this bill has been submitted there has been aroused such a controversy that the limit is going to be raised. It has also developed that in the House the Committee on Banking and Currency held extensive hearings from which they obtained information which the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate has never had. It has also developed that General Dawes testified to certain facts, and his testimony was taken down stenographically but afterwards destroyed.

I am not finding fault with any of these matters remaining secret, if it is desirable to the public interest that they should be kept secret, but I submit that the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate has the same right, or ought to have the same opportunity, of securing information as has the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. GLASS. Well, the Senate committee has the opportunity to do that; it has available the hearings on the House side; and it had a statement from me that covered every point made before the House committee, and we can not get any further information on the subject from any source.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 3616.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

LINCOLN DAY DINNER ADDRESS BY SENATOR WATSON

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] at the Lincoln Day dinner of the National Capital Republican Club on February 12, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

What President, save alone the sainted Lincoln, was ever more maligned and misrepresented than the one who has just addressed us? It is fresh in the mind of every student of our history that in 1862 and again in 1864 the currents of public opinion were all running strongly against Abraham Lincoln until his kindly and patient spirit was almost broken by the fierce criticism of his foes; but when the patriotic people of the country were once aroused to the danger of changing helmsmen in a storm, he was again chosen to continue the task so laboriously begun and to fight on to the tragic end. And what President more than he who to-day sits in the loftiest seat of earth has ever been so traduced and aspersed? Those who claim that he has done too little and those who assert that he has done too much are alike vehement in their denunciation, but yet his bitterest assailants never said what they would have done had they occupied his place in this unhappy time or what different action than his they would have taken had power been placed in their hands.

No President's name appears in the list who has labored more earnestly, or toiled more ceaselessly, or striven more honestly to lift the Nation out of the slough of despond into which it had been plunged by sheer force of conditions than Herbert Hoover, and while these efforts may not have come to full fruition in resuscitating the depleted industries of the land, yet no critic has risen to say that he would have pursued a different course or adopted a contrary policy had power to do so been committed to him.

THE RECORD

The marketing act was passed at his suggestion, but both parties had promised relief to agriculture in their platforms, both had asserted that it was the supreme question that confronted the people and was the first to be solved, and both candidates had pledged their solemn word to deal with that problem before any others were attempted. This is a nonpartisan act, quite as many Democrats having voted for its enactment as Republicans, and so wherein it has succeeded they are entitled to their portion of the credit, and wherein it has failed they must accept their portion of the blame.

Was Herbert Hoover responsible for the market crash in 1929? Could he possibly have averted it, had he foreseen its approach? Could any other President have stopped its coming?

And no sooner was its devastating effects upon our industry manifested than he moved with wisdom and celerity to stay its further ravages.

Has anyone at any time asserted that his conduct was wrong in that respect? What different course could any man have pursued had he been President? What other policy could have been adopted that would have operated as beneficially as the one he chose? He at once called together the captains of industry and secured from them a pledge not to reduce the purchasing power of the laborer's wage or to engage in any other practices hostile to the cause of the workman. Was not this wise and salutary? And while wages have been reduced in multiplied instances, yet it is true that the spirit of the pledge has been kept for, preceding the reduction in wages has gone a reduction in the necessaries of life, so that the purchasing power of the toiler's wage is no less relatively than the day that pledge was given.

And then he called into council the labor leaders of the Republic and obtained from them a promise that they would not strike during the continuance of the depression. And be it said to the everlasting honor of these men and their followers that they have kept the faith. There is no patriot whose heart does not thrill with pride when he contemplates the fact that, while riots have occurred in 20 nations, while revolutions have torn a dozen of them asunder, while blood has run freely in the cities of many other countries, yet not a single outbreak has occurred in the United States of America under the Stars and Stripes.

Let those who criticize these acts say wherein they failed and let them assert what they would have done, had they been in his place, to meet the fierce conditions that confronted him.

THE MORATORIUM

And when the industrial and financial destruction of Germany seemed imminent, and when the whole economic fabric of Europe seemed to be threatened with disaster, he, the one person in all the world whose position was so commanding as to force the action, proposed a moratorium for a year on all the debts and reparations that so troubled Europe and the world. And at this session of Congress both bodies, without regard to partisanship, indorsed the act and approved the action. Can anyone now assert with any degree of truthfulness that there was anything wrong with that policy? Can anyone who assumes to criticize him say that he would have pursued a different course with reference to that condition?

And MacDonald came, and Laval came, both desirous of discussing with him the momentous problems that confront and perplex the whole world, evidencing an intention to work together for the common good of mankind. Was there anything wrong in entertaining these men or in discussing with them the solution of the grave problems that disturb the entire earth?

And let no citizen of this Republic be alarmed at his attitude on the question of our foreign debts, for he has unequivocally asserted that debts and reparations have no relation to each other, that the moratorium he sought was in no wise related to cancellation, that he in no sense favors forgiving those debts, and that he stands for dealing with each nation in accordance with its ability to pay, keeping always in mind the fact that sooner or later each must pay.

There seems to be an obsession in certain quarters here that Europe should settle America's problems, while America should settle Europe's debts, but such is not the conception of the President of the United States, and such action will never meet with his approval.

THE WHOLE PROBLEM

And it is unfortunate for us that in trying to solve this problem we are compelled to deal not only with foreign nations but with many citizens of our own. International bankers who have lent huge sums abroad at high rates of interest and who are far more anxious to see their debts paid than those owed by foreign countries to America have complicated the problem by their influence with foreign nations. But they and all others must certainly see by this time that the American people, almost as a unit, are opposed to the cancellation of one penny of those debts and that, if they are not paid in the future, it will be because they have been repudiated by the nations that owe them and not by reason of their cancellation by the American Government.

We have always cherished the most kindly feelings for all the other nations in the world, and we are anxious to maintain the friendliest relationships with all peoples. We have manifested this disposition many times in the past by unexampled acts of generosity, and we shall always be ready to go to the extreme limit to be of assistance to them in any time of stress or strain.

And yet I can not but express the thought that, under the conditions which to-day exist throughout the world, we should be very happy if they could be so altered that in the future, instead of worrying about what we might be able to do for other nations, we should turn our attention to worrying about what we might be able to do for the people of the United States.

And the whole course of events for the last 15 years should teach us never to send another American boy across either ocean to engage in the brawls and quarrels of any other nation or group of nations on earth, but that in the years to come, should contests arise among them, we should permit them to fight out their own quarrels in their own way without receiving or expecting any aid or assistance from us, unless they purposely assailed us or invade our rights.

But we entered into the last struggle with high resolves and noble purposes; we lent huge sums to the Allies in good faith; they owe it to us in accordance with every principle of international honor and justice, and it is their solemn duty to pay it, and it is our equally solemn business to insist on their doing it.

But the sentimental internationalists still insist that we must "do something for Europe" and for the "oppressed of other lands." Our history attests the fact that no other nation on earth has ever so freely lent itself and expended its resources with a more lavish hand or poured out its treasures more generously for the other peoples of the world than has this great Republic.

And by 1917 we found ourselves in a position where we could grandly aid in solving the titanic contest of human history, and we now know that we reached that stage by looking after our own interests, by attending to our own business, by building our own railroads, by investing our own capital, by employing our own labor, and by building up the mightiest trade among ourselves ever known to any people of the earth. We thus accumulated vast riches, riches which enabled us to fly to the succor of other peoples in a time of dire distress.

And we shall continue to help in the future whenever the national conscience shall be stirred and the national sense of justice aroused; but when the time comes it will be for us to say how we shall help, by what method we shall help, and how much we shall help; it will not be for any supergovernment set up over on the other side of the ocean, composed of nations hostile to us in our every phase of national life, to settle these questions for us; these things we shall determine for ourselves free from the interference of any or all the other nations on earth combined.

And hence if we are as wise now as we have been in the past we shall avoid the entangling alliance proposed for us by our Democratic friends in suggesting an international conference to determine the tariff policy of our land.

THE PRESENT CONGRESS

The President led off at the beginning of this session with certain broad and sweeping recommendations for legislation. After full debate two of these proposals have been enacted into law, and I am very happy to state that in each case the action was altogether nonpartisan and that both parties patriotically voted to sustain the policies he has advocated.

And can anyone say that his recommendations have not been wise and timely and patriotic? Certainly those who voted for these measures can not be heard to criticize them, nor will any of them even attempt to do so, for they supported them and thus testified to their belief in their efficacy.

Others of his proposals yet await our attention and doubtless will likewise receive the practically united support of Congress; and, whether any or all of these measures accomplish any or all of the objects he had in view in proposing them or Congress had in contemplation in enacting them, no one can deny that the President is doing his level best, using all of his splendid ability, and consuming every ounce of his energy in attempting to lead the people out of this blighting depression up to a high plane of prosperity.

And let those who criticize him say wherein he has failed or in what respect they would have altered his policies or changed his proposals.

THE TARIFF

And this spirit of internationalism that so disturbs us has cropped out in a startling manner in the proposal of our Democratic friends to establish an international conference to deal with our tariff. This is but an echo of the preamble to the Covenant of the League of Nations, so overwhelmingly repudiated by the American people whenever an opportunity has been presented, in favor of "the removal of trade barriers and the creation of equality of economic opportunity among nations," through a world supergovernment.

That all the people of the earth should be merged into a common economic unit, with one standard of living, is the main objective of our international bankers and many sentimental internationalists as well, the bankers desiring that all tariff rates should be lowered to enable foreign nations to sell their products in our market in order to obtain sufficient money with which to pay the debts foreign people have contracted with those bankers; and the sentimentalists, forgetting their own country and the welfare of our own people, still clamoring for us to do something for "oppressed Europe."

All of our dealings with foreign nations should teach us that in such a merger the American people would "trade assets for liabilities," for the proposition is born of the thought and purpose that our Government should submit its entire tariff structure to a body composed, with a single exception, of foreigners all jealous of the prosperity of the American people, hostile to the tariff policy of our Government, and determined so far as humanly possible to reduce us to a level with themselves.

Can anybody imagine that in this leveling process European wage earners are to be brought to a level with American wage earners? Is not the sole purpose to reduce the wages and the standards of American laborers to those of Europe, for how else can a common level be established?

If the gentlemen who propose this scheme are satisfied with American wages, why do they want an international conference at all? On what possible grounds can they urge the assembling of such a body? It must be that their sole desire is to reduce the level of American wages, thus hoping ultimately to force a common standard of living for all the peoples of the world.

But will the wage earners of America tamely submit to such a scheme? What hope is held out to them if their competitors abroad fix their wages through lowering our tariff rates? How can the American wage scale be maintained under such a system? How can the American standard of living be upheld? Manifestly an international congress can lower American wages, but by no manner of means can they raise those of the people of other lands.

If our tariff be lowered so as to permit a great influx of cheap goods from abroad made by those who receive European wages, how can the wages of Americans be increased or how can the unemployed find work? If we buy goods abroad, we do not buy them in America; and if we do not buy them here, we either put out of business or keep out of business those who are making them here; and how on earth can that policy inure to the benefit of the American laboring man?

We can not sell to our own people what we are producing at home, and how, then, can we hope to sell the products of other nations here? Such a process would vastly increase the competition in our own market and prevent absolutely the reemployment of our idle labor and a return to conditions of prosperity in our land.

Our exports are valued at from 6 to 8 per cent of our total commerce, and, because of greatly increased and greatly cheapened production abroad, are destined to grow less rather than to increase. The Democratic proposition is to sacrifice the 92 per cent of our total market by entering into a world merger, and, with the hope of increasing the 8 per cent, to lose a goodly portion of the 92 per cent we now enjoy in our own market.

American exports must meet the world competition in the world's market, and if we vastly increase these exports how can we add to the prosperity of peoples already depressed or employ laborers already out of work? We but intensify the competition that already withers the commerce of those nations.

What is most urgently needed in this country is that we increase consumption and revive commerce within the limits of our own land. As we produce practically everything that is needed for the supply of our population, we can accomplish this purpose by assailing it purely as a national problem, and our system is such that the Government can solve it by again producing a steady flow of money, by loosening up credits, and thus bringing about a gradual restoration of confidence, which is the touchstone of American success.

We can expect prosperity to return when money once more flows in a full stream and not before, and it can not be made thus to flow by filling our markets with imported products made by laboring people who receive from one-half to one-fourth the wages of those who produce the same products in our own land.

We must look for this prosperity in our own country, and yet the leaders of the opposition are loudly proclaiming that by exports alone can our domestic problems be solved and our economic ills be cured. They see the vast needs of foreign countries unable to pay and fix their minds on financing and rehabilitating them instead of giving attention to the people of our own country, who are equally unable to pay but who are seeking work, and who will never be able to find it if we buy the products of other people instead of those of the laborers of our own land.

And so, my countrymen, before we fly to the help of foreign nations in distress let us look well to the condition of our own country. We can not bring back prosperity to our people by purchasing abroad what we can make at home, by opening European factories and closing American factories, by enhancing the productive power of other peoples and furnishing them a free market in our land in competition with the products of our own people. This process, instead of increasing the power of other people to sell in this land, would decrease the ability of our own people to buy either their products or our own, and who in this country can be benefited by such a policy as that?

THE SIMPLE FACTS

We are constantly told that we can not sell abroad if we do not buy abroad, and that we can not buy abroad because our tariff walls are so high that imports can not come in over them. But those who make these assertions pay no attention whatever to history, for every tariff law enacted in the last 50 years conclusively shows that, regardless of the rates imposed, our foreign commerce, both imports and exports, greatly increased under the added stimulus given to American labor and American industry.

The further fact is that the price of our domestic products does not depend upon the amount of exports but rather on the amount we consume at home, and the amount we consume at home depends on our domestic prosperity, largely based on the employment of home labor.

I have high Democratic authority for this statement. On the 9th day of December, 1921, the joint committee of agricultural inquiry, which had spent months investigating the relation of exports to domestic prices, made this report. Two of the members of that committee were none other than the distinguished leader of the democracy in that body, Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas, and eloquent defender of Democratic tariffs for all the products of the United States except those of Mississippi, Senator HARRISON. Time forbids that I shall quote more than the significant sentence of this report, but it tells the whole story and furnished ample refutation to the present tariff proposals of these two honorable Senators:

"Perhaps the most notable fact shown by this table is the tremendous drop in the price of wheat during 1920 and 1921, notwithstanding an increase in exports. It seems this drop can be attributed almost wholly to the falling off of domestic consumption and the beginning and continuance of industrial depression."

In other words, it is not necessary that we should export more than we do in order to be prosperous, but it is necessary that all those who are now idle should be put back to work; that the American wage scale should be maintained; that our mills and factories should be equipped with the finest machinery the world affords; that American capital should flow freely in all the arteries of trade and the veins of commerce, and that we should have a full-rounded symmetrical industrial activity.

And that tells the story of American prosperity and of American progress.

And so, my countrymen, let us cling to the faith that inspired Abraham Lincoln throughout the turbulent years of his career. Abraham Lincoln, who did not scruple to seek office as a Republican, who had his name placed on the Republican ticket, who advocated Republican principles and policies, and who stood for a pronouncement of Republican platforms and under the inspiration of his genius our party had led the Nation along the pathway of history until to-day we stand unrivaled among the nations of the world in all those essential elements of civilization that make for the welfare of the human race.

EQUALITY OF RADIO BROADCASTING SERVICE

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, on yesterday I introduced the bill (S. 3649) to amend the radio act of 1927, as amended. I have had so many requests for a statement explaining the bill that I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the bill, together with the explanatory statement, which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the bill and accompanying statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the second paragraph of section 9 of the radio act of 1927, as amended by an act entitled "An act continuing for one year the powers and authority of the Federal Radio Commission, under the radio act of 1927, and for other purposes," approved March 28, 1928, is amended to read as follows:

"It is hereby declared that the people of all the States and the District of Columbia are entitled to substantial equality of radio broadcasting service, both of transmission and of reception, and in order to provide such equality, the licensing authority shall as nearly as possible make and maintain an equitable allocation of broadcasting licenses, of bands of frequency or wave lengths, of periods of time for operation, and of station power, to each of said States and the District of Columbia when and in so far as there are applications therefor, and in determining such equitable allocation the licensing authority shall give equal weight, as nearly as may be, to population, to gross area, and to the number of receiving sets in homes as determined by the Bureau of the Census. The licensing authority shall carry into effect the equality of broadcasting service hereinbefore directed, whenever necessary or proper, by granting or refusing licenses or renewals of licenses, by changing periods of time for operation, and by increasing or decreasing station power, when applications are made for licenses or renewals of licenses: Provided, That if and when there is a lack of applications from any State for the proportionate share of licenses, wave lengths, time of operation, or station power to which such State is entitled, the licensing authority may issue licenses for the balance of the proportion not applied for from any State, to applicants from other States for a temporary period of 90 days each, and shall specifically designate that said apportionment is only for said temporary period. Allocations shall be charged to the State, District, Territory, or possession wherein the studio of the station is located and not where the transmitter is located: Provided further, That for the purpose of preventing a needless waste of broadcasting facilities, the licensing authority may in its discretion allocate to States situated wholly or principally west of the Continental Divide, broadcasting facilities in excess of those to which such States would normally be entitled on the basis of population, gross area, and number of receiving sets in homes, when such additional allocations will not materially impair radio broadcasting transmission or reception in other sections of the country."

Brief in Support of Proposed Amendment to Section 9 of the Radio Act of 1927

NEED OF AN AMENDMENT

The radio act of 1927, as amended, by act of Congress approved March 28, 1928, provides in section 9 that radio broadcasting facilities shall be distributed equally among the five zones created by section 2 of said act, and within each zone shall be distributed equitably among the several States, according to the population thereof.

The five zones created by the act are not equal in population (largest 28,735,212, smallest 12,323,836), in area (largest 1,786,473 square miles, smallest 138,619), in number of radio receiving sets in homes (largest 3,784,637, smallest 866,056), in wealth, in facilities for radio-program production, or in any other respect. They conform to no geographical, social, economic, or political groupings. The arbitrary mandate that radio broadcasting facilities shall be distributed equally among five zones which are manifestly unequal in every respect tends solely to deprive the people within certain zones of the radio broadcasting facilities to which they are clearly entitled, and which it is the expressed purpose of this section of the act of guarantee to them.

Equitable distribution among the States is rendered impossible by the requirement of equal distribution among the unequal zones. The quota for each State must at present be determined solely by its relationship to its zone, not to the country as a whole.

Furthermore, the establishment of population in the wording of the act as the sole basis for determining equitable distribution is so manifestly unreasonable that the Congress itself, in dividing the country into zones for the purposes of this act, did not use population as the sole basis, but likewise gave consideration to geographical area.

Finally, the present system of allocation gives no consideration to the fact that conditions west of the Rocky Mountains differ fundamentally from those in the East and central sections, with the result that western radio listeners are arbitrarily and unjustly deprived of service which they could have without material injury to listeners elsewhere.

It follows that the inevitable result of the operation of section 9, as amended, has been to deprive the people of many States of the radio broadcasting service to which they are entitled, and which the act itself undertakes to insure for them, and to waste no small part of the very limited facilities available for broadcasting by compelling their use in regions where they can render the minimum of actual service to the public.

BASIS FOR SOUND DISTRIBUTION

Whatever may be the administrative value of the zone system as created by the radio act of 1927, it was never intended by the Congress, in drafting the original law, to serve as a basis for the distribution of radio facilities, nor is there any sound justification for its being so used. The same principle which makes the administration of radio communication a matter for the Federal Government makes the proper distribution of radio broadcasting facilities a matter to be considered nationally, with the States, as in all other questions under the Constitution, the units.

In determining the quota of radio broadcasting facilities to be allocated to each State in order to produce an equitable distribution, three prime factors must be considered:

(1) Population: This is already specified in the existing law, and is the obvious measure of the maximum number of people who can receive radio broadcasting service in each State.

(2) Area: The effective service range of any radio broadcasting station, no matter what its power, is so sharply limited that if two States have approximately the same population, and one has twice the area of the other, a mathematical equality of broadcasting facilities will mean that the people of the larger State actually enjoy only about half the service enjoyed by those in the smaller one. Disregard of the requirements of geographical distribution, rendered mandatory by the present law, means that the Government actually denies the right of many of its citizens to any reasonably dependable radio broadcasting service whatsoever.

(3) Number of receiving sets: Manifestly, only that portion of the public which is equipped to receive radio service can possibly benefit thereby. Broadcasting to a hundred thousand people who have no receiving sets is an obvious waste of facilities. When the act of 1927 was passed, and also the 1928 amendment thereto, no accurate information as to the number of receiving sets in homes was available, but the census of 1930 has provided that information.

In view of the barrier created by the Rocky Mountains, wide geographical separation, and time differences, special provision should be made for additional broadcasting facilities in the far West if an utterly needless waste of such facilities is to be avoided.

THE SPECIFIC PROPOSAL

The proposed amendment to section 9 of the radio act of 1927, as amended, maintains the principle of equitable distribution of radio broadcasting facilities, both of transmission and of reception, but declares that the State, and not an arbitrarily created zone, is the unit to which such distribution shall be made, and provides that an equitable distribution shall be made on the basis of population, gross area and number of radio receiving sets, each of the three factors to be given approximately equal weight, except that the licensing authority shall be empowered to allocate additional broadcasting facilities to States situated wholly or principally west of the Continental Divide when such allocation will not materially impair radio broadcasting reception in other sections of the country.

It provides further that this distribution shall apply solely within the limits of the continental United States, excluding Alaska and the island possessions. It was never the intent of the Congress to include these within the five zones for other than administrative purposes, and their automatic inclusion under the provisions of the 1928 amendment is manifestly unreasonable.

THE FORMULA

A very simple method for determining the proper quota for each State, so as to give each of the three specified factors approximately equal weight, is to take the total population of the continental United States, its gross area in square miles, and the total number of receiving sets in homes, as shown by the 1930 census, and bring the three figures to approximate equality by multiplying the smaller ones by the proper factors. Multiplying the total number of square miles by 40, and the total number of receiving sets by 10, the resulting figures are: Population, 122,770,546; area, 121,071,560; receiving sets, 120,783,450. The sum of these three figures is 364,625,556, one-third of which is 121,541,852. This becomes the weighted total figure for the entire country on which distribution of radio facilities is based.

A similar figure is readily arrived at for each State and the District of Columbia. In each case the figures for the total population, the gross area in square miles multiplied by 40, and the total number of receiving sets in homes multiplied by 10, are added together and the sum divided by 3. The resulting figure, giving equal weight to population, area, and number of receiving sets, bears the same relation to the weighted total figure for the whole country as the broadcasting "units" to be allocated to that State bear to the total number of such units for the country as a whole. In the case of States wholly or principally west of the Continental Divide allocation of broadcasting facilities in excess of the quota figure is discretionary with the licensing authority.

NO RADICAL CHANGE

Such a system of allocation, giving due weight to all the elements which ought justly to be considered, would result in no sweeping changes, even in the hypothetical quotas set up under the present law. It is common knowledge that these quotas do not represent the actual facts; some States at present are "over quota" and others "under quota." The proposed system, in the case of 21 States and the District of Columbia, is actually closer to existing facts than the hypothetical quotas set up under the present law, because not even an act of Congress has been wholly successful in contraverting economic and social needs. In most of the other cases the effect of the proposed amendment is to rectify manifest injustices. The proposed amendment is simply designed to recognize these social and economic requirements and to use them as a basis for legislation which shall really accomplish what the law as it now stands purports but fails to do—provide really equitable distribution of radio broadcasting facilities throughout the United States. In so doing it corrects certain manifest injustices worked by our present illogical method.

Accepting the "unit system" established by the Federal Radio Commission under the present law, with its total of 400 "units" for the United States, the following table shows (a) the number of "units" to which each State is now entitled under the present "zone and population" system; (b) the number of "units" actually represented by broadcasting stations now licensed; (c) the number of "units" to which each State would be entitled under the terms of this proposed amendment by the formula herein set forth.

Table showing the number of "units" each State is entitled to now, the number represented by stations now licensed, and the number for each State under the proposed amendment

REPAYMENT OF CERTAIN LOANS BY FARMERS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the city to-night and will not be here when the calendar is next called. I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Order of Business 211, being Senate bill 2265. I think there is no opposition to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be stated by title for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 2265) to extend the time for repayment of certain loans to farmers for the crop of 1931.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, is not that too important a bill to be taken up in this fashion?

Mr. BARKLEY. It merely authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to extend for another year the time of repayment of seed loans which were made last year. In my State the failure to enact legislation of this character would work a great hardship and it is urgently needed.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator ought to give us a chance to read the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill has been on the calendar for a number of days.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it was my intention to move an adjournment. I am familiar with the bill referred to by the Senator from Kentucky. I am sure that it will meet with favorable consideration at the hands of the Senate. If the Senator from Kentucky shall be absent to-morrow, I will look after his bill when the calendar shall be called.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator may not be in a position to give the Senate all the information on the subject if there is any objection or opposition to the bill. However, I do not want to press the matter now if the Senator is unwilling that it should be considered.

Mr. McNARY. There are so few Senators present at the moment that I doubt the advisability of pressing it. As I have said, I intend to move an adjournment, the calendar will come up to-morrow, and I will look after the bill for the Senator. I am familiar with it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 17, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou All-Wise and Merciful God, Thou are speaking to us every day. From the rising of the sun until the going down of the same and from the blowing of the wind to where it listeth, these are all Thy voices; they speak of Thy truth and Thy bounty. To Thee, O Lord, belongs all the praise and glory; but why is our praise to Thee? It is not the flower that makes the sun radiant; it is the sun that pours its warmth and light into the flower that makes it grow and blossom. We rejoice that in some way we are bound to Thee; it gives us great comfort. We live because Thou dost live, and we stand because Thou dost stand. O grant us a higher reach of life, a life that is above all that is material. May we live by faith, by hope, and by humility, and crown our hearts with the mercy of gratitude. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

DESIGNATION OF MR. MEGILL TO SIGN CERTAIN PAPERS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication, which was read and ordered spread upon the Journal.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1932.

Hon. JOHN N. GARNER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Desiring to be temporarily absent from my office, I hereby designate Mr. H. Newlin Megill, an official in my office, to sign any and all papers for me which he would be authorized to sign by virtue of this designation and of clause 4, Rule III of the House.

Yours respectfully,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I very respectfully ask permission that I may be privileged to address the House for 19 minutes on Thursday morning following disposition of matters on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that on Thursday morning he may be permitted to address the House for 19 minutes after disposition of business on the Speaker's table. Is there objection?

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I gave yesterday, I am compelled to object.

COMMENCEMENT OF TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, MEMBERS OF CONGRESS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. Under the previous order of the House, the question is on agreeing to the amendment to Senate Joint Resolution No. 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Iowa opposed to the bill?

Mr. RAMSEYER. The gentleman from Iowa is not opposed to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there any Member of the House opposed to the resolution seeking recognition? If not, the Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAMSEYER moves to recommit Senate Joint Resolution 14 to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment by inserting, after section 5 thereof, the following new section:

"SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress; and the act of ratification shall be by legislatures, the entire membership of at least one branch of which shall have been elected subsequent to such date of submission."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa to recommit the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAMSEYER) there were—ayes 71, noes 65.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The call is automatic.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 204, nays 184, not voting 43, as follows:

So the Senate joint resolution was passed.

Mr. McDuffie and Mr. Niedringhaus (for) with Mr. Perkins (against).
Mrs. Norton and Mr. Cable (for) with Mr. Lehlbach (against).

Mr. Douglas of Arizona with Mr. Johnson of Illinois.
Mr. Lea with Mr. Strong of Kansas.
Mr. Kelly of Illinois with Mr. Taylor of Tennessee.
Mr. Whitley with Mr. Sullivan of Pennsylvania.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. JOHNSON, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. REID. I withdraw my vote of "no" and answer "present."

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. NELSON, of Missouri, is absent on account of serious illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. SWEENEY, is absent on account of illness in his family. If present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman present and listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. DOUGHTON. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not qualify.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, in Senate Joint Resolution 14, just passed, the quotation marks are at the end of section 5. There having been a new section added, I ask unanimous consent that the quotation marks at the end of section 5 be stricken out and inserted at the end of section 6.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Now, Mr. Speaker, in my motion to recommit, adding section 6 to Senate Joint Resolution 14, there is a typographical error in the new section 6. The words "three-quarters" where they appear in section 6 should be "three-fourths." I ask unanimous consent that the words

"three-quarters" in section 6 be changed to "three-fourths."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEES

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Democratic committee on committees I offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 146

Resolved, that PATRICK J. CARLEY, of New York, be, and he is hereby, elected chairman of the standing Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress; and that the following be, and they are hereby, elected members of the following standing committees, to wit:

Accounts: JERE COOPER, of Tennessee.

Expenditures in the Executive Departments: LINDSAY C. WARREN, of North Carolina.

Education: CLAUDE V. PARSONS, of Illinois.

The resolution was agreed to.

PROHIBITION

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, on January 15 the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] and myself introduced resolutions into the House providing for an amendment to the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. It had been our purpose to introduce a resolution jointly, but we found there was a rule which prevented that. Therefore, we introduced the same resolution separately. My resolution is No. 208 and Mr. BECK's resolution is No. 209. This proposed amendment to the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution was drawn by a committee appointed by both sides of the House, and there was unanimous agreement as to the amendment which was introduced. To-day the Committee on the Judiciary met and voted against reporting Resolution No. 208 by a vote of 14 against and 9 for. My purpose in rising is to announce that on the 25th day of this month we will have a petition upon the desk for the signatures of Members who desire to have the resolution brought before the House for a vote, and on the 14th of March, the discharge day, we will hope to bring the resolution before the House for a vote. [Applause.] I might add that nine of the committee in favor of reporting out the resolution is very encouraging.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. Provided we sit every Saturday, when will the 30 days expire?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The 30 days are calculated from the 15th day of January, when the resolution was referred to the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, is it the purpose of the gentleman to place in nomination as a candidate for the Presidency a man who voted against the submission of the eighteenth amendment in the first instance?

Mr. BLANTON. No. I merely want to burst a soap bubble.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the wet move made by my friend from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] is an idle gesture. After he goes to all this trouble and does get a vote, he will find about 75 to 100 Members—the old guard, as it is called—voting for his proposal, just as there were only 15 Senators voting for the Bingham beer proposal in the Senate. He will not get any more strength in the House proportionately than they got in the Senate. What is the use of wasting the time of the House in an idle gesture for liquor when this House is safely dry? Nothing whatever is to be accomplished. I predict that not all of the Members who sign the petition to discharge the committee will vote wet when the crucial issue arises. They are going to hear from their constituents back home who are done with the liquor traffic and who do not want a return of the open saloon.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8397), making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to. Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Interior Department appropriation bill, with Mr. O'CONNOR in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For topographic surveys in various portions of the United States, $366,000, and in addition thereto $150,000 of the unexpended balance for the fiscal year 1932 is continued available for the same purpose for the fiscal year 1933, of which amount not to exceed $345,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in cooperation with States or municipalities except upon the basis of the State or municipality bearing all of the expense incident thereto in excess of such an amount as is necessary for the Geological Survey to perform its share of standard topographic surveys, such share of the Geological Survey in no case exceeding 50 per cent of the cost of the survey: Provided further, That $256,000 of this amount shall be available only for such cooperation with States or municipalities.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TEMPLE: Page 73, line 15, after the word "heads" in line 14, strike out all of lines 15 to 25, and on page 74 all of lines 1 to 5, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

"For topographic surveys in various portions of the United States, authorized by the act of February 27, 1925 (U. S. C., title 43, secs. 39 and 40), $616,000, of which amount not to exceed $345,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That of this amount $190,000 may be expended in amounts equally apportioned among the 38 States containing unmapped areas for continuing the general utility topographic survey, and $10,000 may be expended in amounts equally apportioned among the 10 States in which topographic mapping has been completed for any needed revisions or resurveys: Provided further, That the remainder may be expended for cooperation with States or other civic subdivisions; for mapping areas directly under Federal jurisdiction or areas of special Federal interest; for office projects, and for expenses incident to the administration of topographic surveys: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in cooperation with States or other civic subdivisions, except upon the basis of the State or civic subdivision bearing all of the expense incident thereto in excess of such an amount as is necessary for the Geological Survey to perform its share of standard topographic surveys, such share of the Geological Survey in no case exceeding 50 per cent of the cost of the survey: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available immediately upon the passage of this act."

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, while this bill was under consideration in general debate I called attention to the situation that would be created by the paragraph just read if it should not be amended. Briefly, the current appropriation for the year ending June 30 next carries $780,000 for this purpose. The Budget Bureau cut the estimate for the following year to $616,000. The bill of the committee cuts it still farther to $366,000, plus $150,000 of the unexpended balance. The first thing I wish to call attention to is the fact that there will not be an unexpended balance of $150,000. When the committee made its report, the figures that were available to the committee at that time indicated that there would be such an unexpended balance, but under the plan in operation the States appropriate, and out of the Federal appropriation the appropriation made by the States is matched. Some States have appropriated since this bill was prepared, and at least three others are expected to make allotments prior to the beginning of the field period for this year, so that it is expected the unexpended balance will amount to only $85,000. Out of that, of course, it is impossible to reappropriate $150,000. My amendment proposes a restoration of the amount estimated by the Bureau of the Budget, $616,000, which is already cut from $780,000 appropriated for the current year. The matter with which I have just dealt I have no doubt everyone will recognize. The amendment should be adopted at least to that extent, or an amendment provided which will abandon the idea of appropriating $150,000 out of $85,000. That is a matter which unquestionably should be corrected.

Another very important matter is this: Eighty-seven of the two hundred and twenty-one engineers engaged in topographic mappings have either been furloughed already or are listed for furlough at the close of this fiscal year. That is a cut of considerably more than one-third of the total force. I do not believe that any other department or bureau of the Government is likely to suffer so much. We are not cutting off one-third of any other department.

I believe in economy, but I do not believe in disrupting the Government service. These 221 topographic engineers are appointed from the graduates of engineering schools and technical colleges. They are appointed at a salary of $2,000 a year, and from that they advance until some of them receive $4,000, and those in charge of the various districts sometimes receive as high as $5,000; but from the time they are appointed until they become as expert as the trained men in the service, the service estimates it costs $10,000 to train each of them. To discharge 87 men whose training has cost the Government $10,000 each would be to get rid of an investment of $870,000 in order to save $100,000, which is certainly not economy.

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. There is one other matter I want to cover. The law which was passed in 1925 provided for the completion of a topographical map of the United States in a period of 20 years. There never have been appropriations that would send the work along at that rate. I am not asking for any increase in the appropriations. I am asking that such things may not be done as will imply the total abandonment of that policy to which Congress and the Government as a whole has been committed.

Under the plan of requiring the States to match, dollar for dollar, certain States have not been making appropriations. It so happens that most of those States are the less prosperous States, many of them in the South. The North and the Northwest, for the most part, have been making the appropriations, and the maps are being made in those States. The result is that the map makers can only work in the summer time, because in the winter the climate will not permit them to work in the North. It is proposed by my amendment to make a small appropriation of $5,000 for each State, which we do not require the States to match. If that is done, we can keep those field engineers at work in southern States in the wintertime, where the climate will permit it. At present we bring those field engineers into Washington and put them at draftsmen's work—high-price men at low-price work. If this amendment is passed, we can employ high-price men at the high-price work in the field, and that will be another matter of economy.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The subcommittee charged with the preparation and report of the Interior Department appropriation bill gave most earnest consideration to this particular amendment. On every hand economy is urged. The best way to economize is to reduce expenditures. During the last fiscal year the Budget was not balanced by $903,000,000. It is estimated that we will be behind about $2,100,000,000 next year. The Committee on Ways and Means has been conducting hearings for the past two or three weeks trying to find some new sources of taxation, and, if reports be true, they are having a most difficult time trying to find them.

The committee that is charged with the preparation of this bill held very careful and painstaking hearings. We found that on this one item there was an unexpended balance of $150,000. Now, if we add the $150,000 to the $366,000 it makes $516,000. If we had an expended balance this current year, if the States did not meet it 50-50 this year, there is no probability of the States meeting it next year.

Permit me to say that the States are finding it as difficult to raise revenues as the Federal Government. There is not a State in the Union that is not behind. To illustrate: In my own State of Oklahoma, whereas three years ago there were eleven or twelve million dollars coming in from a 3 per cent gross production tax on oil, this last year it was but little more than $4,000,000.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. SWING. What is the reply which the gentleman makes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Doctor TEMPLE, that while it was true at the time of the hearing $150,000 was unexpended, yet before the fiscal year has expired that money will have been spent?

Mr. HASTINGS. Of course, our hearings were to the contrary. Our hearings showed that $150,000 was unexpended, and that is what we go by.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. TEMPLE. That is unquestionably true, and it is also true, as I said in my remarks, that since the hearings were held other States have made appropriations, and there are three others still pending—Michigan, Texas, and Minnesota—and they are likely to make that appropriation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heard the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I know the gentleman made the statement in good faith.

Mr. TEMPLE. And I know it is true.

Mr. HASTINGS. Permit me to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and to the membership of this House that this item can be cut more and hurt less than any other item in this appropriation bill. [Applause.] There is no question about that. I know as well as I am standing here that my State and many other States of the Union will be compelled to use their revenues for other purposes than this. I know that Oklahoma and many of the States will be unable to match this fund. The committee had no thought of crippling this service, but we feel we have made adequate appropriations and that the House ought to back up the Committee on Appropriations in its effort to economize wherever it can without hurting the service.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, it is not a pleasant job that we have on the Appropriations Committee. Many times we must do things that our hearts would have us not do. I find myself to-day in opposition to a Member of this House for whom I have not only a high regard and respect but a real personal affection. He has been very helpful to me, yet I am in opposition to him because I am charged with the responsibility of looking after the United States Treasury as it affects the affairs of the Interior Department.

This committee held hearings on the 5th day of January of this year. On that date the gentleman, Mr. Mendenhall, in charge of the activity from which we have taken $100,000, made the statement that appears in the hearings. Since January 5 until to-day our committee has not been communicated with. We have not had any information save that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has given to us on the floor.

It is a serious matter that confronts us. We have a Budget which we must try to balance. We have fixed costs in that Budget which exceed $3,000,000,000. Three billion dollars of the Budget we now have can not be changed in any way. This year we have a deficit of $2,000,000,000 plus, and we have only $1,500,000,000 with which to meet that $2,000,000,000 deficit. Where are we going to get the money? [Applause.]

It is not pleasant to come here and reduce the amount of money with which a bureau of this Government operates. It is not a happy piece of work; but it is a responsibility that comes to the members of this committee.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Gladly.

Mr. BLANTON. In my home county, where the people wanted a topographic survey made, they did not make one. They have made a topographic survey of the Voss section in my district. I have not had a single request for one of the maps. They have made a topographic survey of the Mullin section in my district. I have not had a request for a single map. They have made a topographic survey of the Tow section and of the Stacy section in my district, and I have not had a request for a single map. That answers my friend from Pennsylvania. They are doing work which requires appropriations but from which the American people in this time of distress get very little real benefit.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman state briefly just what the effect will be on this work if this cut is made as now carried in the bill? What difference will there be in the situation this year and the next fiscal year because of this cut?

Mr. MURPHY. The effect will be that a number of high-grade technical men will be furloughed. Our committee felt this was one governmental activity that could very well mark time until the finances of this Government should recover. We are only taking from them $100,000. There is $150,000 of this fund yet unexpended and not being matched by the States.

Mr. BARBOUR. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MURPHY. Gladly.

Mr. BARBOUR. Then the purpose of this cut is not to discontinue this work or permanently reduce it, but the amount of the appropriation is reduced simply for the period of this year in order that the work may be slowed up and thereby save a certain amount of money.

Mr. MURPHY. The gentleman is correct in his statement.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Gladly.

Mr. TEMPLE. I think the last statement made by the gentleman may be misunderstood. He said it is proposed to cut $100,000. The current appropriation is $780,000, and the Budget Bureau recommended $616,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. If the $150,000 of unexpended balance were there still, the committee's bill would cut $100,000 under the Budget Bureau's estimate, and that was a cut of $164,000. There would be a cut of $264,000 below the current appropriation even if there were an unexpended balance of $150,000 from which to appropriate, but there is not.

Mr. STAFFORD. What harm can come to the country at large even if the cut is made?

Mr. MURPHY. I think I answered that question a moment ago in answer to a question by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR].

Mr. STAFFORD. My attention was diverted for a moment.

Mr. MURPHY. Our committee feels this is one governmental activity which can stand a cut. We know the Treasury needs the money. We know that no activity which touches the lives and the welfare of the great mass of the people will be affected in any way, shape, or form save only the loss of salaries given to those who are now connected with this survey.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I would like to say to the gentleman, by way of preface to my question, that in my State, Kentucky, the legislature has withdrawn the entire State appropriation for the geological department, with the exception of the geologist's salary, so even if this appropriation were made as asked by the department, with the depression throughout the South like it is, it is very likely that a number of the Southern States would be unable to match the appropriation, and therefore it would be unavailable.

Mr. MURPHY. Now, gentlemen, we realize that it is not pleasant to reduce the activities of a governmental department. We realize that is not a pleasant thing to do, but we do ask you gentlemen who are charged with the same responsibility with which we are charged to back up your committee in the work they are trying to do for the benefit of the people of this country. Again let me emphasize to you that we are short $2,000,000,000 plus, and we only have $1,500,000,000 to take care of that $2,000,000,000. What is to be the outcome? We are going to pay more taxes. Everyone knows that and everybody is coming to Washington protesting against additional taxes being placed on the particular activities of their congressional districts. This is one time when you must forget party politics. You have got to realize that the country is in a position the like of which it never experienced before, and I do hope that my good friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. TEMPLE, out of the goodness of his heart, will not try to go too far in trying to help his friends who are in this activity of the Government at this time. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I have such great confidence in the members of this subcommittee that I find myself very hesitant in opposing any item they bring in here. I have seen them at their work, and know how thoroughly they do it. I sincerely believe that if they had been able to go over the work of the Geological Survey in the same thorough manner in which they have gone over a number of other activities of the Government under the Interior Department they would not have been so drastic in their cut of this particular item; but, of course, the work done under this paragraph can not be marshaled for inspection, as can some of the others.

The importance of this particular work of completing the topographical survey of the entire country has not been sufficiently stressed. We all agree on economy. It must be practiced. We must economize, we must cut expenditures in every possible direction; so all of us have agreed in our own minds that so far as possible, without crippling important activities of the Government, we are going to cut ruthlessly. I approach this amendment in that spirit.

If I did not feel that a very important activity of this Government is going to be so deeply cut as to seriously interfere with the proper progress of its work, I should not take the floor in behalf of the amendment.

The gentleman from Texas speaks of his constituents not having asked him for copies of these topographic maps. This is quite natural, because the ordinary individual probably would not care to have copies of the topographic maps. To the average person not concerned with any work involving engineering problems these maps would have but casual interest. But they have a tremendous value as a basis for engineering work of many different kinds. This is an age of highway building, of irrigation and drainage, of searching for adequate water supplies and storage; it is an age of water-power development and the distribution of electricity; and in all of these the surveys made by the Geological Survey are absolutely necessary. In water-power development, for instance, in determining where the backwater of storage reservoirs will reach, what land will be flooded. In the case of highways and railroads, the grades over our mountains and ridges must be known. If the topography is not determined by the Geological Survey, when the roads are laid out this basic work must still be done. The same as to water-power developments, water supplies, the building of dams, and all the rest.

It is a tremendously important work that is being crippled and delayed. To do the kind of work provided for here requires engineers of a very high degree of training. We have trained a considerable number of these engineers. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said, we have invested a very large sum of money in such engineers, and now we come to a place where, instead of using this capital which we have invested in these men, we are asked to "furlough" them, as the gentleman says, which is just a nice way to describe laying them off, which is what will happen. They are not going to be used for the next two years unless this amendment is adopted. Many of those who are kept in the service, instead of being sent into the parts of the country not yet mapped so that they may go on with the work requiring a high degree of technical skill, are brought here to Washington, and during the winter months are put down in the department here to do drafting work which could be done by cheaper employment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will my friend yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. My friend from Connecticut spoke of the technical engineers who do this work. If the gentleman will investigate in the field, he will find that most of them are sophomores and juniors and seniors from engineering classes of various schools, and some of them in my State have been clamoring to me to get jobs for them during the coming summer. I am sympathetic and would like to help them get such jobs. But we must balance the Budget.

Mr. TILSON. I would like to see the work done. This is my chief interest in the matter.

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). But we have got to meet a deficit in the Treasury that is growing to the extent of $7,000,000 a day.

Mr. TEMPLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TILSON. May I have five minutes more, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. TEMPLE. May I reply to the gentleman from Texas? No engineering party doing topographic work ever went out under the control of a sophomore or junior from college. The head of the party, who does the work and draws the contours in the topographic map, is a trained engineer, but the department is conducted so economically that the men who carry the chain, the men who carry the rods, and other men in the party are sophomores or juniors or freshmen, and they do not get more than pay enough to meet their expenses there and back.

Mr. TILSON. There is no doubt that these "sophomores" from the engineering schools are good men for chainmen and rodmen, but the men who really do this work are highly trained men. These men are to be laid off and this important work is going to be stopped. I tell you, friends, this is far too important a work to be thus crippled. Every map of the country is based on these topographic maps.

Mr. CLAGUE. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. CLAGUE. How are we going to effect economies if we do not try to do something like this?

Mr. TILSON. Oh, we must effect economies and we are cutting here in this item, even if this amendment is adopted, for even then the appropriation will be far below the sum asked for in the Budget. There will be about a thirty-three and a third per cent cut in this work over last year's appropriation even if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is adopted. What I am arguing for is not to stop economies—not at all—I shall vote to cut other items just as I am voting to cut this one, even with the gentleman's amendment, but my point is that we should not take all of the cut from one comparatively small item while sparing far larger items for far less important activities.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. In 1927 we appropriated for this purpose $451,000, whereas we are appropriating now $516,000. In 1928 we appropriated $510,000, whereas we are appropriating $516,000 now. In 1929 we appropriated $505,000. Now, will the gentleman point out in detail how, and in what way, if we appropriate $516,000, this service will be crippled?

Mr. TILSON. The appropriation last year, as I understand it, was $750,000. They lacked $85,000 of using it, and this is to be reappropriated. The report at the hearings was $150,000, but later corrections make it now $85,000, which is a cut of $65,000 more than appears in this bill.

Even if we accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, it is still a cut, as I understand it, of more than $150,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? The gentleman is a good lawyer and a good business man. By this amendment it is proposed to appropriate $5,000 to some States where it is not needed. Five thousand dollars to get votes from each State.

Mr. TILSON. It is hoped to carry on the work in places where it can not be carried on in the wintertime.

Mr. STAFFORD. Five thousand dollars to every State in the Union, and in many States where it is not wanted at all.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, it is unusual for a Member to impugn the motives of another.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, this is not the first time that the gentleman from Idaho has risen to criticize me.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman from Wisconsin sometimes gets excited. He does not really mean to impugn the motives of anyone, I shall assume.

Mr. STAFFORD. The proposal here is to give every State $5,000, regardless of any contributions from the State or whether they want it or not.

Mr. TILSON. It is not to be given—it is all to be used in this work.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is to appropriate $5,000 for topographic work in each State where it is not needed and not even desired.

Mr. TILSON. It is all to carry on the work in an economical manner, where, in certain States during the winter months it could not be carried on otherwise.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Connecticut says that he believes in economy; that he believes in cutting to the bone; but he would economize and cut to the bone by adding $100,000 to this appropriation.

I am reminded of what Uncle Joe Cannon, of revered memory, then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, said when he was invoking strict economy—"the only way to reduce is to reduce."

I want to say to you gentlemen that if you are going to reduce appropriations and balance the Budget you must cut these appropriations regardless of how it may affect you. [Applause.]

I have sat in the committee room with my colleagues on the Appropriations Committee and have listened to propositions put up to us which we recognized had merit, but which we felt could be postponed in this hour, when many people of the country are begging for bread. Yet Members of Congress rise in their seats and make proposals to take out of the Treasury money which it is not necessary to appropriate at this time.

There is not a man in this House for whom I have a greater affection and respect than my good friend from Pennsylvania, Doctor TEMPLE, the author of this amendment. He rendered a distinct service to the people when he put this law in effect in 1926. But, gentlemen, in 1926 your Treasury was overflowing; you had more money than you knew what to do with, you had hundreds of millions of dollars at the end of the fiscal year, which, happily, was applied to our public debt.

But what is the condition to-day? I am going to say again what has been said so many times on the floor of this House. I do not like to repeat it, but I do not think it can be repeated too often in the face of these efforts to increase appropriations. You had a deficit of $903,000,000 last June which you had to absorb in the public debt. They tell us that on June 30th, next, you are going to have another deficit of $2,100,000,000; and, mark my prediction, it is going to exceed that sum before we reach the end of the fiscal year. This deficit, too, must be absorbed into the public debt, because it will be impossible to take care of it by taxation before that time.

Then what happens? In June, 1933, they tell us you are going to have a deficit of from $1,400,000,000 to $1.700,000,000.

Gentlemen, that is a serious situation, and we are not going to solve the problem by increasing appropriations on appropriation bills. Do not forget that.

You and I have our opportunity here. I dare say many desirable appropriations will be left out; but I ask every one of you gentlemen, including the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] and my good friend from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON], what harm, what injury, is going to result if we leave this appropriation out for one year? Perhaps the work will be delayed—of course it will; but what real injury will result if for one year we reduce this appropriation by the small sum of $100,000? I have the greatest respect and admiration for the five members who constitute this subcommittee. They have done a great work. For weeks and weeks they have sat in the committee room behind closed doors conducting hearings, and have brought out a splendid bill. They have rendered a distinct service to the people in bringing this bill to you as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Without for one moment minimizing this service, without for one moment detracting from what my friend from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON] said with reference to its value, if it were left with me, I would cut the whole proposition out for one year. [Applause.] I would feel in doing so that I was rendering the people and the taxpayers of this country a greater service by saving them $516,000 than I would be by appropriating that sum to do this work in 1933. [Applause.] What is the proposition? This committee has recommended an appropriation of $366,000 and a reappropriation of $150,000, making a total of $516,000. That sum, under the terms of this bill, will be expended in 1933 for making a topographic survey of the United States in many of the States. Is there anyone here who does not think this could be reasonably left off for one year? Could we not have postponed it for one year? Is it an absolutely essential matter? Of course it is not. Yet my friend from Pennsylvania, whose earnestness and enthusiasm for this great work I admire, proposes to add another $100,000 to it. When you add another $100,000 to it you are just increasing your deficit for 1933 by that amount. I am not here to discuss the merits, but I am here to appeal to you, as I have done in the past and expect to do many times in the future, not to forget the people back home, not to forget that somebody has to pay this money, and that those people are the taxpayers of the country. [Applause.] I think we can render no greater service to the taxpayers and to the people of the country than by reducing these expenditures to the bone. I would do it not by increasing the appropriations, as my friend from Connecticut would do, but I would do it by reducing them. I know we have cut out many desirable projects. This has been necessary. We have cut out many which, in my opinion, ought to be eliminated forever, and ought never have been put upon your appropriation statutes. We have cut them out in the hope that in a few years, when prosperity comes again, when our Treasury begins to overflow as it did in 1926, this work may be resumed. But what does my friend propose to do?

As the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] pointed out, he proposes to take away a cooperative feature with reference to this law. He wants to appropriate $190,000, if I heard the amendment correctly, out of the Public Treasury with no obligation on the part of any State to match that money. I agree with my good friend from Texas. The people at large are not particularly interested in this matter. I think we should defeat this amendment, and we ought to defeat every amendment increasing appropriations that is proposed unless it is absolutely essential to the progress of our Government. No man will stand upon his feet and say that it is essential to carry on this work in 1933, and I repeat, if I had my way, I would cut it out entirely. [Applause.]

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Debate upon this amendment is not wasted time if we can bring to the House any answer to the question that was asked by the last speaker as to the value of the work that will be done if the amendment is adopted, and what will be lost if it be defeated. It is a proper and a relevant question and ought to be answered by some one if possible. It is true, as the gentleman from Texas points out, that the ordinary man back home does not write to his Congressman for topographic maps as he used to send in for vegetable and flower seed, or as he does now for the volumes on deceased Members of Congress, or other things to hang on the wall in the form of George Washington posters, or calendars. However, there can be no important physical development in any part of the country that does not rest and have its foundation on these maps. There is not an engineer in the whole United States who will not say that these maps have saved the taxpayers of the country a thousand times what they have cost. I have served four years upon the flood control committee, and was there attending hearings when we were trying to get the great Mississippi flood project under way as quickly as possible to save lives and property in that great valley. Were it not for the fact that the Mississippi Valley was then virtually complete in its topographic mappings it would have been four years or more before that great relief measure could have been started, because before they could have known where to put a single levee for the protection of lives and the homes of people living in that great valley, they would first have to run the same surveys that are run to make these topographic maps. But fortunately other Congresses, wise in their day and age, had made appropriations to continue this work, and the work had progressed so far in that valley that it was possible to use the topographic maps as the basis of the great flood-control plan for the Mississippi Valley.

The building of roads, canals, railroads, irrigation projects, flood-control projects, power developments, and the location of flying routes across the country are determined largely by the use of these topographical maps.

In this connection permit me to discuss the next paragraph on this page about stream gaging. What will happen if we curtail these activities and we miss a year with reference to the records of the run-offs of the various streams? Missing one year in stream gaging will make inaccurate and unreliable 20 other years, the records of which have been kept, because, after all, on the consideration of floods, on the consideration of power development, on the consideration of irrigation, we must have an accurate record of the year-to-year run-off of the streams, and when one year is missed here and one year somewhere else, all of the work that has been done is made inaccurate and unreliable and nonuseful for long-distance calculation.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. In the gentleman's State last summer this committee encountered a condition of a lack of water supply, and we began to ask questions. We could not get an answer from any scientific man connected with any department of Government to inform us how long it would require for the subterranean basin to fill with water again, which was so sorely needed. The scientific men are unable to tell us anything about how long it will require for the ground to fill with water again. If they could do something like that, I might be able to understand the position taken by the gentleman from California.

Mr. SWING. That, too, is one of the studies which the Geological Survey makes, and it is one of the valuable things which it does. It is one of the things for which we will provide appropriations within the next few minutes.

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I would like to have the gentleman answer in his time this question: What is there before Congress that is more important than balancing the Budget? What is there that is more important than that?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire if we can not agree on closing the debate on this amendment and this paragraph. There seems to be a great many requests, and perhaps we may let it run on for a few moments.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWING. Based upon the current appropriation made by the Federal Government, the State of California matching it dollar for dollar, it will be 50 years before the topographical mapping in California is completed. Therefore, it may well be understood why I am so tremendously interested in having my State get the benefits of this valuable service, which has been rendered so almost completely in the Eastern and Middle Western States. The current expenditure is $780,000. That has been cut by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania for next year to $616,000, which was the amount recommended by the Budget, or a saving on this item over the current expenditure of $164,000. We ought not to cut below that figure.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. How greatly hastened would be the completion of the survey in the gentleman's State, which he says will require 40 or 50 years, if we should now grant the additional $150,000?

Mr. SWING. At least it will keep it going at the present rate.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Has the gentleman made any calculation with reference to that?

Mr. SWING. I have not.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Does the gentleman understand that this is an appropriation to be expended in the discretion of the officials, and that they can make surveys in urgent areas and leave out unimportant places?

Mr. SWING. Well, I suppose it is always in the discretion of the officials.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by including a telegram from the Governor of the State of California, a telegram from the State engineer of the State of California, and a telegram from Mr. George T. Seabury, secretary American Society of Civil Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, are there many telegrams, and how long are they?

Mr. SWING. There are three, and they are very short.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., February 3, 1932.

Hon. PHIL D. SWING,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Am informed appropriation bill reported to House proposed amounts $237,000 under the estimated offerings of States for cooperative stream gaging and topographic mapping. Such a reduction would necessitate abandonment of stream-gaging stations with interruption of records and abandonment of topographic surveys initiated, with furlough of scientific personnel trained through years of experience. This cooperative work has been initiated by the States upon pledge of Congress that it accepted principle of dollar-for-dollar cooperation, and abandonment of the policy involves heavy losses. Would further call attention to fact that for every dollar reduction this item there is corresponding reduction in amount payable by States, and, therefore, unemployment situation correspondingly aggravated. California appropriated $100,000 annually for this work and prosecution thereof vital to success of State water plan. This appropriation not available if unmatched by Federal money. Would respectfully solicit your earnest attention this matter.

JAMES ROLPH, Jr.,
Governor of California.

SACRAMENTO, CALIF., February 2, 1932.

PHIL D. SWING,
Washington, D. C.:

Appropriation bill reported fails to meet estimated State offerings for cooperative stream gaging and topographic mapping by $137,000 and $100,000, respectively. If bill passed as reported, unless deficiency appropriation made later Geological Survey will be forced to abandon many gaging stations and furlough technical personnel which it has required years to train. Abandonment of gaging stations means interruption in stream-flow records, and continuity is most vital factor. Proposed reduction these items of appropriation bill poor business, because means loss of $2 in service and employment for every dollar reduction. Means also breaking faith with States, which were previously assured by Congress that it approved principle dollar-for-dollar cooperation, and means waste of State funds expended in good faith under above assurance for gaging stations, which must be abandoned and topographic surveys initiated which must be discontinued and remain incomplete and useless. Such course of action will be serious blow to physical development of the State. Am wiring FRENCH, TAYLOR, MURPHY, and engineering council. Is there anything else we can do to help situation? Could you arrange hearing before committee if we send representative?

EDWARD HYATT.

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 10, 1932.

JOE CRAIL and PHIL D. SWING:

Technically trained engineers members Los Angeles, Sacramento, and San Francisco sections American Society of Civil Engineers adopted strong resolution, and so advised you, in support of urgent value of topographic mapping as expressed by Hon. HENRY W. TEMPLE. Am advised House will consider subject first thing after convening to-day, and therefore urge your attendance when discussion Interior Department bill is resumed and your support of Temple's amendments of topographic surveys.

GEORGE T. SEABURY,
Secretary American Society of Civil Engineers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

The motion was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For volcanologic surveys, measurements, and observatories in Hawaii, including subordinate stations elsewhere, $21,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I was on my feet to offer the pro forma amendment in connection with the item immediately above, and to that I want to call attention for just a moment.

The item reads, in line 10:

For fundamental research in geologic science, $50,000.

I particularly call your attention to the hearings conducted by the subcommittee on this particular item. I am sure, after the hearings have been perused, the membership will agree with the statement made within the last few moments about the advisability of temporarily laying aside some of the activities of Government which, in flush times of the Treasury, might be entirely proper. I am sure this will be abundantly justified by the phraseology to which I now refer.

I venture to read just a sentence or two in order to give you a little taste, so that if the membership desires to pursue the matter further, and will turn to pages 732 and 733 of the hearings, they can see some words which they never saw before and will learn of some activities of the Federal Government that certainly they never even imagined were entered upon by the Government. Just a little taste of it will be afforded by the testimony from which I am now going to read, which is the testimony of Mr. Mendenhall, in charge of this particular bureau.

Speaking on fundamental research in geologic science, he has this to say:

The subject selected for research may be so closely connected with the problems of a great industry like metal mining or petroleum production that it gives promise of immediate practical results; or it may be a subject that seems utterly remote from the business world, such as tracing the ancestry of the modern horse back through the ages to the little 5-toed creature of Eocene time.

Then in ordor that you may know that these projects have a very wide range may I call your specific attention to the program of investigation for the current year and upon which reports are now being written, and here again I shall not extend my remarks by including all the references made, but I just want to give you a little bit of a taste. For instance:

The projects on which work is continuing are: Mineralogy of the potash minerals and of the southern California pegmatites; spectrographic study of minerals for the detection of rare elements.

Further along is—

Petrography of sedimentary rocks.

Then here is—

The microstructure of clays; glacial geology of the northern Rocky Mountains and Great Plains region.

And then to indicate that they are right up to date and have a program which touches life in a very vital relationship, the program for the year 1932 might be outlined.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. LOZIER. Does the agenda of that activity include a dissertation upon the Pickwickian theory of Tittlebats and other kindred subjects?

Mr. KETCHAM. Not being within the purview of geologic science, that subject has not been mentioned in this particular agenda. Here is the program for the next year.

Stratigraphic and structural studies in the Permian Basin of the Southwest; siliceous sediments of the Monterey group in California; the constitution and structure of coal; source rocks of petroleum.

Now, gentlemen, you understand it is not my purpose to utter a single word that shall be in any sense faultfinding with the distinguished men of science who are in this particular department, but the point I am emphasizing is this, that the rocks about which these investigations have been made or are now proposed have been here for some thousands of years, yea, some millions of years, and their investigation is not, therefore, a pressing duty and function of government, as desirable as it may be under certain circumstances. I would like if time would permit to pay tribute to the distinguished men who are making studies in this particular field.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KETCHAM. It is not my purpose, as I say, to utter any word that would in any way reflect upon these scientists or their splendid activities, but the point I am stressing is this, that in times like these, certainly this splendid committee ought to be complimented for the care with which they have scrutinized this particular item and I want to congratulate them for asking this bureau to forego these studies to the extent of 50 per cent for the present, and for having cut the appropriation in that particular department from $100,000 to $50,000.

There are many branches of government, where, undoubtedly, a close scrutiny would show a like opportunity for the accomplishment of savings, and I hope that before this Congress adjourns we shall have set up a committee, if we do not already have the proper machinery, that shall make a very careful investigation of every department of government to see whether or not like economies may not be accomplished by possibly examining into the practicality of the particular lines of work they have under investigation. The reorganization of Government departments proposed by President Hoover is timely and would accomplish great savings.

To go back just an item or two, we find $350,000 expended for geologic surveys over the country and $300,000 of it to be expended in the District of Columbia. In constantly recurring items, where the proportions spent are similar to this, it seems to me, are the places where we could apply economy to a good purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, this is an opportune moment to bring to the attention of the committee and of the House that to-day there was introduced a resolution by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, authorizing the Speaker of the House of Representatives to appoint a committee of five, to be known as the Economy Committee, for the purpose of making an investigation of the bureaus and commissions operating in the Federal Government to determine which ones may be abolished, which may be curtailed in their activities, and to recommend to the House of Representatives on or before the 15th day of April the economies that may be effected as a result of the investigation—economies having to do with or flowing from not only the abolishment or curtailment of the activities of certain bureaus but economies which may be effected in any other way.

The necessity for such action, I am confident, will be made clear to the members of the committee.

Bear in mind that the measures which have so far been adopted by the House of Representatives as remedial measures are but superficial; they are inflationary in character; they do not strike at the fundamental difficulty; and until the House of Representatives and the Congress has the courage to do the fundamental thing which must be done all of these superficial measures will fall by the board and collapse. [Applause.]

It has been stated so many times that it is hardly necessary to repeat that we are confronted with a crisis of the first magnitude. It must be met not hysterically but calmly and courageously. As you have been told, there was a deficit for 1931 of over $900,000,000. There was a governmental deficit for 1932 of over $2,100,000,000, and you have been told that we face a deficit of at least $1,250,000,000, exclusive of debt retirement, for the year 1933.

These figures are important because they lead to one inevitable conclusion, namely, that the United States has been living beyond its income; and, as a corollary, that we have reached a parting of the ways; that we must now either elect to continue to live beyond our income or we must balance the Budget. The decision rests with the Members of this body and the Members of the body at the other end of the Capitol.

If we continue to borrow money to meet our current operating expenses, the credit of the United States immediately becomes impaired. That this has already occurred is clear if we will but reflect on the extent to which Government securities have depreciated in the market.

It is important to call to the attention of the committee that once the credit of a political subdivision becomes impaired, once a suspicion is created that that credit may not be good, the suspicion rapidly is transferred into a conviction, and in turn the conviction is rapidly converted into action, with the result that the credit collapses. Collapse of the credit of the United States Government, which is not at all impossible and not at all improbable if we continue to live extravagantly as we have done, means, in the first place, the collapse of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has its foundation on the credit of the United States. It was the credit of the United States that was loaned to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which made that corporation possible. If the credit so loaned be not good——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. If the credit so loaned be impaired, then the credit erected upon it becomes impaired not in arithmetical progression but in geometrical progression. Moreover, if the credit of the United States becomes impaired, it is inevitable that we must experience a period in which banks, large and small, from the Atlantic to the Pacific will collapse, with all of the untold suffering and loss that follow in the wake of such a collapse.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I am pleased to yield.

Mr. YON. Does the gentleman think this same condition is affecting the credit of the different States and their outstanding obligations?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. For the gentleman's information, the total bonded indebtedness of the United States to-day is over $30,000,000,000. States, counties, and municipalities have defaulted, roughly, in the amount of $700,000,000 during the last year. So exactly the same effect upon Federal credit would be, and is, as a matter of fact, being felt on State credit.

In addition to the collapse of banks, if the credit of the United States be impaired, the bill which this House passed yesterday becomes entirely futile, for it must be remembered that what the House authorized yesterday was an issuance of notes against certain collateral security, among which it may be presumed are the securities of the United States. If these securities themselves are no good or are impaired, then the currency so issued against them becomes nothing more nor less than fiat money.

As against this picture, as against a picture of complete economic chaos, as against electing to follow the course of continued borrowing, we have the choice of balancing our Budget. When we balance our Budget we make our credit sound. We maintain the integrity of the United States' obligations. By this procedure we insure the possible success of these inflationary and superficial measures which we have heretofore passed at this session of the Congress.

So I say we have the choice of either following the course which leads inevitably to complete destruction or following the course which leads to safety and a basis for hope.

That the Budget must be balanced is then a conclusion which we arrive at as a result of our reasoning; but I raise the question if there is not, perhaps, somewhere in the world the experience of another great power which might confirm our own independent conclusion.

The example of England throws considerable light upon our present problem. Twelve years ago the English people conceived the credit of the United Kingdom as being absolutely impregnable, as a credit that was absolutely untouchable, as a credit that could not be impaired, and England embarked upon a period of extravagant appropriations. Her tax rates were raised, and, as a result, her industrial activity declined. Men were thrown out of employment in each succeeding year in increasing numbers until finally the proudest kingdom in the world was brought to her knees in August of 1931, and Philip Snowden——

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question right at that point?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I shall be delighted to yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Would the gentleman be kind enough in that connection, if he does not have the figures available now, to set out the comparative wealth of England and her national debt at that time? I do not know whether the gentleman has those figures available, but that would be very enlightening because from such figures we may draw a comparison with our own situation which would be very helpful.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I can say to the gentleman that England's national debt is approximately £7,000,000,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. And what is her total national wealth?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Her total national wealth I do not know, but I do know that her total tax burden, that is, the tax burden imposed by the Parliament itself, in addition to the tax burden imposed by municipalities, is approximately equivalent to 25 per cent of her national income.

Mr. KETCHAM. Hers is much greater than ours.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Much greater than ours. Ours is approximately 15 per cent of the national income. It is obvious therefore that we are proceeding in exactly the same direction.

Philip Snowden, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 10th day of September, in reporting the economy bill to the House of Commons, stated:

> I rise to discharge one of the most disagreeable tasks that has ever fallen to my lot. It is no pleasure to call upon people to make sacrifices or to bear additional burdens, and only a consciousness that those sacrifices and those burdens are necessary to avert far greater sacrifices and burdens makes my task this afternoon tolerable. Honorable members will remember that in February of this year I gave the House of Commons and the country a grave warning of the serious budgetary position. On the eve of the adjournment, fortified by six months of further knowledge and experience, I repeated that warning. An unbalanced budget is regarded as one of the symptoms of national financial instability.
> It is undoubtedly a fact that nationally we have, for some time past, been living beyond our means, and living to a considerable extent upon our capital. The trade depression of the last 10 years has reduced the yield of taxes and at the same time increased expenditure. Seven years ago the unemployment insurance fund was paying its way. It was paying off debt. This year it is costing the Exchequer about £100,000,000. The national income has been falling rapidly. There are something like 3,000,000 persons, one-time producers, now inactive. Profits, upon which national revenue must largely depend, have fallen 20 per cent during the last two years, and in many industries wages are being paid out of capital. Now, this is the problem that I have to solve, and it can be solved only in two ways, either by reducing expenditure or by increasing taxation—or by a combination of both. We have been under the delusion during the last few years, in these times of unparalleled depression, that we can maintain the expenditure of prosperous times.

I submit to the members of this committee that the Chancellor of the Exchequer there presented a picture of what is occurring within the United States.

So that as the result of the example of another great power, we are thrown back on the conclusion that the Budget must be balanced. Our own conclusion is therefore confirmed by experience. The question arises as to how it may be balanced.

Last week the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. CRISP, spoke feelingly, courageously, and well to the House. In his speech he frankly stated some of the difficulties that the Committee on Ways and Means was confronted with. He told us that it was almost impossible, if not actually impossible, to balance the Budget by means of increasing taxes. He said that even after the high rates had been imposed on incomes, even after the miscellaneous taxes had been imposed, even after the estate taxes had been imposed there was still remaining an unbalanced amount equivalent to $268,000,000. But if it were possible to balance the Budget by the collection of taxes in addition to those enumerated—taxes onerous and burdensome on industry and all of the people—the question naturally arises, Is it wisdom to follow such a procedure?

The function of government, among other things, is to permit at least of economic conditions which will provide employment to every citizen. As taxes are increased the purchasing power of the community becomes less, because, obviously, the money which otherwise would have been used for some other purpose must be paid to the Government, and as that process goes on the purchasing power becomes less and less by virtue of the absorption by the Government of revenues which could be used for other purposes. Moreover, taxes impose burdens on industry from which employment flows. As they increase the employing power decreases. It is therefore much less of a burden on the people to cut appropriations than it is to increase taxes. To cut appropriations offers a much more immediate remedy than to increase taxes, and, moreover, to cut appropriations lays a foundation for an economic recovery. It is the most important thing that the Congress can do to reestablish confidence throughout the country. Whenever the country knows, is led to believe, that we are giving more than lip service to economy, that we are, as a matter of fact, determined upon cutting appropriations, then I think I can assure you there will be a restoration of confidence throughout the land. [Applause.] So we are thrown back upon the conclusion that in addition to raising taxes we must cut appropriations.

Finally, then, to bring this picture down to date, let me give you this contrast: By cutting appropriations, practicing rigid economy, we restore confidence, we make available for purchases money which might not otherwise be made available for purchases, we refrain from imposing on industry burdens which retard its employing power, and we thus create a beneficent wheel which revolves always in one direction, always for the better. And as against that, if we fail to practice economy, if we do not balance the Budget, then we will have created a malevolent wheel which is revolving constantly in an adverse direction and which means inevitably complete and utter economic collapse of the United States. Complete economic collapse of the United States means far more than simply a limited Territorial collapse. It means plunging the whole world into darkness, because to-day the United States is the creditor nation of the world; if that creditor nation collapses, there is nothing to which we can look for support. So, as against doing one of two things—balancing the Budget by exercising rigid economy or continuing to live extravagantly and borrowing to meet our current operating expenses—we can look forward either to a ray of light in the event we follow the former course or to utter blackness in the event we follow the latter. [Applause.]

Question arises as to how these appropriations may be cut. I have gone over the appropriations for the last 10 years and, excluding the amount to service the public debt, and exclusive of permanent appropriations; in other words, by including only the appropriations necessary for current operating expenses, I find that the National Budget has increased $942,000,000, almost $1,000,000,000 in round numbers. The legislative department has increased $8,958,000, the Veterans' Bureau has increased $396,000,000, the Department of State has increased $6,900,000, and the Treasury Department, $168,781,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arizona has expired.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The War Department has increased $86,867,000, the Navy Department $47,000,000, the post-office deficit $155,000,000—there was no deficit in 1923—the Interior Department $11,000,000, the Agricultural Department $139,000,000, the Department of Commerce $25,973,000, the Department of Labor $7,567,000, the Department of Justice—reconciling the appropriation for prohibition and removing it, as I did in the case of the Treasury Department for 1923—$35,949,000, and the District of Columbia, $21,238,000.

Why, within a period of 10 years, within the span of a decade, should the ordinary operating expenses of the United States have increased approximately $1,000,000,000, scattered, as you see, throughout the various departments? It is because coincident with personal living at an extravagant rate you and I and every other Member of Congress have come here with some bill authorizing an extravagant appropriation for some particular purpose which would result in benefit to some particular district. It is because you and I have come here seeking to impose on the United States Government functions which should not be imposed upon the Government. [Applause.] It is because you and I have been coming here advocating either the creation of additional bureaus or the enlargement of the then functions of bureaus.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We have been in session only a little over 30 working days, and yet it is said that there are bills now pending before Congress asking for appropriations amounting to thirty billions of dollars.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I thank the gentleman. It is because, as a result of these various bills which you and I have advocated, which you and I have come in on the floor of this House and supported, which you and I have voted for, it is because of that procedure of which all of us are guilty, that the appropriations have increased; and as both an incident to and cause of the increase in the appropriations, and certainly as an incident to the increase in the number of bureaus, Mr. Chairman, you would be astonished to know that the number of Federal employees has increased 68,000 in the period June 30, 1923, to June 30, 1931.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Does the gentleman know how many have been increased in the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I would be delighted to answer the gentleman. That is a very small increase—something like 481. The largest increase is in the Post Office Service, some 30,000, but that still leaves approximately 38,000 that have been absorbed in various other bureaus.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. And that increase has come about within what time?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Eight years.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. YON. In the past 10 years the Federal employees have been increased 68,000?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. There were on the pay roll on June 30, 1931, 68,000 who were not on the pay roll on June 30, 1923.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think it would be interesting for the gentleman to insert in his remarks at this place the departments where those increases have occurred.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I yield.

Mr. ARENTZ. Of course, we can not get a clear picture of the situation in the Post Office Department unless we consider the additional personnel, due to the half holiday on Saturdays, for instance. If the men do not work all day, there must be more men put on. The same thing applies to other departments of like nature.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Regardless of what the cause might be, the fact is—and it is an unpleasant fact, and it is a fact which we must all face—the number of Federal employees has been increased 68,000.

I cite all of these increases because they indicate clearly and conclusively to my mind the necessity for the resolution introduced to-day by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] authorizing an economy committee.

It is a matter of interest to know that a little over a year ago, when England was confronted with exactly the same situation with which we are here confronted, there was such a committee set up by the House of Commons, and as a result of the report of that committee over $350,000,000 were cut off the national budget.

Mr. Chairman, we face a critical condition—a crisis of the first magnitude. It is for us, the Members of this House, as public servants intent upon performing a public duty, to meet our obligations fairly and squarely, to have the courage, if you please, to vote against appropriations which might benefit our own districts; to have the courage to go back and face a political fight, but to play our part here honorably, courageously, and to go back at least with the satisfaction which comes from the knowledge of a task well done. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] has made a very interesting statement. The gentleman is always clear and concise and the gentleman is always able to use figures advantageously. I consider the gentleman from Arizona one of the ablest legislators of this House. Hence my anxiety when I note his activity toward a policy which I fear is promoted and inspired by a desire to eliminate certain Government activities rather than economy.

Mr. Chairman, we keep on talking about balancing the Budget and exercising rigid economy, and those are rather catchy phrases. It has become the popular thing to talk about balancing the Budget and exercising rigid economy, coupled with the declaration that when Congress exercises economy the country will get back to prosperity.

Now, I submit it is hardly fair to blame Congress or the present budgetary condition of the country for the depression, the unemployment, and all the economic evils we are now suffering. I submit that any Member, no matter how careful or deliberate his statement may be, in his appeal for Government economy and the desire to balance the Budget, ought to couple that statement with definite recommendations—just where he would exercise that economy. The Committee on Appropriations and its various subcommittees are laboring now with every appropriation bill, and I ask the gentleman from Colorado and I ask the gentleman from Ohio if they have not pared down this appropriation bill to the very bone?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will say to the gentleman that I feel personally if there is any criticism due to this committee it is because we have not cut as much as we should. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman is in charge of the bill and in a position to offer any amendment he desires. The bill is before the House, and any motion which the gentleman from Colorado will make to cut down any item I am sure will receive the approval of the committee, as the committee has gone along with the gentleman all the way. There is no doubt about that.

The gentleman from Arizona made a statement that unless it is amplified will lead the country to believe that Congress has been wild, extravagant, and improvident during the last 10 years. The gentleman speaks of the increase in the budgetary appropriations of $1,000,000,000 in the last 10 years. If we will analyze the appropriations for the various departments, we will find that almost the entire amount of this increase has been taken up in three measures. One of the three is agricultural relief. Could Congress do anything else than try to bring relief to the farmers of the country?

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Whether the relief was effective or not, I am not discussing, but the condition of the farmer was such that we could not ignore it, and Congress, in the light which it had at the time, had to take some measure at least, in an attempt to bring relief to agriculture. That required a large amount of money.

Then within the last 10 years we had the Mississippi flood. Could Congress ignore that and take no action? After the suffering and devastation that took place in that country we appropriated hundreds of millions of dollars to carry out the flood-relief program; also the drought, which called for unexpected appropriations. And within the last 10 years we have had the aftermath of the World War, and we have had to take care of veterans. Could that have been avoided, in the light of the tradition and the custom of the American people in looking after its veterans? In connection with the war we must not overlook the national debt caused by the war, and now requiring $1,000,000,000 a year for interest and sinking-fund requirements. Can the gentleman from Arizona reduce the amount required for debt service?

I submit that there are the three items that absorb almost entirely the $1,000,000,000 referred to by the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The increase due to the Veterans' Bureau absorbs $396,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In 10 years?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The gentleman would draw his line too finely. The increased amounts in appropriations since the war take the greater percentage for veterans. The increase in public works absorbs $277,000,000. The increase in public works includes rivers and harbors, flood control of the Mississippi, Boulder Dam, and every piece of public work that is under construction.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Exactly.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That leaves $360,000,000.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And we appropriated how much for agricultural relief?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That does not include that.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is an appropriation. Here are the items: Farm relief, $500,000,000; rivers and harbors and flood relief, over $300,000,000 additional in the 10-year period; veterans' requirements, increase of about $400,000,000.

Now, the distinguished Member from Arizona criticized the increase in personnel.

Now, taking just a few fixed items in our current expenditures and appropriations for the coming fiscal year commencing July 1, interest on the public debt, $640,000,000, which is an increase of $35,000,000 on the interest requirement of last year; sinking-fund retirements to meet the maturing bonds, $426,489,600, which represents an increase of about $15,000,000 over last year. We have already appropriated in Public Resolution 3, $203,925,000 for the Veterans' Bureau, and an additional $46,872,975 contained in the first deficiency bill. The appropriation bill will carry an item of $928,387,795 for the Veterans' Bureau, which sum will probably be $50,000,000 short of actual requirements. Here alone we have well over $2,000,000,000. In addition to that we authorized and appropriated $500,000,000 for the Finance Reconstruction Corporation. And in addition to that we appropriated $125,000,000, increasing the capital stock of the Federal land banks. True, in both of the last items mentioned, we will get the stock of the corporation. In the meantime it is just paper, and we have given out cash from the Treasury. I mention these large items in order to controvert the impression which might be created by all this wild and loose talk of economies and balancing of the Budget. It is the extraordinary and unusual expenses brought about by the world depression which have created these large appropriations and in addition to that the enormous cost of the war directly reflected in the cost of the veterans' care and the requirements of the debt service.

Of that you take 30,000 and you have your increase in the Postal Service. Along with that you have to take your increase in population and your increase from third to second and second to first class post offices. This is still a growing country. We are not yet static and naturally, as we have population growth, we have increases in personnel.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. If the gentleman listened to my statement—and I am sure he listened intently—he will remember that I did not undertake to criticize the increased number of postal employees.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. All right. There you have 30,000 accounted for.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Because I do not know sufficient about it to make an intelligent criticism, but I do submit that the remaining 37,000 and some odd are subject to very severe criticism. [Applause.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Let us take your whole 37,000 and eliminate them—eliminate them entirely. Will that bring prosperity back to the country? But the Veterans' Bureau, Department of Justice, Coast Guard, Border Patrol, Farm Board have all required additional personnel.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. It will save something like $70,000,000 to the National Treasury.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Seventy million dollars in the face of a $2,300,000,000 deficit; in the face of a depreciation in property values and loss of wages running into billions of dollars. Why, gentlemen, do not let the idea go out from this Chamber at this time that this picayune additional expense is what is going to bring prosperity back to the country. [Applause.] I am for economy and my record in this House will show that I have contributed toward economies. I will not be a part, however, to a plan for the reduction of the wage scale and the lowering of the standard of living in this country.

I will not be a party to any plan, under the guise of economy, to abolish or destroy the usefulness of any department of Government or bureau which we have created to regulate commerce, to supervise activities, to protect the interests and the lives of workers, or any bureau charged with regulatory powers to prevent oppression or exploitation. I know some people do not like the Bureau of Mines. Under the guise of economy amendments were offered to the appropriation bill for the Interior Department which, if approved in the Senate, will cripple the Bureau of Mines. I am sure the Senate will not do that. The Bureau of Mines has rendered and is rendering useful service, and though not coming from a mining State I shall oppose the destruction of the effectiveness and usefulness of this bureau. I know a large number of people would like to see the Federal Trade Commission weakened and impaired and are urging reduction of appropriations to that end. We will fight that.

I repeat I am for economy, but I am not for pretended economy or using economy as a weapon to weaken, destroy, or abolish useful departments of the Government such as the Federal Trade Commission because certain people resent being kept within the law. The Children's Bureau, the Women's Bureau, and the Bureau of Labor Statistics in the Department of Labor are also targets that are to be shot at under the guise of economy because their useful work has interfered with some special interest. The Federal Board for Vocational Education, United States Employees' Compensation Commission, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, the Personnel Classification Board, the Public Health Service, the Board of Mediation, the United States Bureau of Efficiency may all suffer under this drive for economy, but I am sure this House will stand up and protect them when they hear all of the facts and the real reasons back of this movement. I shall before long take this subject up again in detail and show where the opposition originates against many of these bureaus.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Delegate from Hawaii offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii: On page 74, in line 14, strike out the figures "$21,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$32,000."

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, after this very important discussion I feel a great hesitancy in even suggesting this pro forma amendment, and I say a pro forma amendment, because I shall withdraw it. I merely want to take this opportunity of inviting attention to the unequal method by which we have made these cuts. Many of the services in the departments have hardly been touched, but the cuts, such as they have been, have been more particularly in the field services.

Here is what might appear to some people as an unimportant item, but to those who live in earthquake areas it is a very important measure. This volcanologic section has just been built up to the point where it might and has become of service to the country, and here we have an appropriation which represents a 33 per cent cut from the estimates, and the estimates themselves represent a 10 per cent cut over the previous year's appropriation. It will be reflected completely in personnel. The little section at the present time is operating with six permanent employees. The cut as made in this appropriation will eliminate four of them, a 66 per cent cut, and it is that particular phase of the matter that I wish to bring to the attention of this committee.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to revise and extend my remarks and to include therein a telegram and letter from the volcanologist in charge and one from the Secretary of the Interior bearing on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Delegate from Hawaii asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram and letters referred to follow:

HILO, February 1, 1932.

Delegate HOUSTON,
Washington, D. C.:

Replying your radiogram see Public Budget, Department Interior 1932, page 345, volcanologic survey, for figures permanent expansion authorized by act of Congress fiscal year 1932 now organized with new personnel just getting into its stride. Staff is patient, loyal, and efficient. Four salaried officials with family are settled in a remote place with investments in home. Organization of self-sacrificing employees in rigorous climate of Alaska and California mountains in addition. Hawaiian Research Association has increased its expenditures and buildings this last year in spite of business depression to meet Government increase in personnel. Proposed cut would mean dismissal of two Government scientists and two subordinates and Alaska plants abandoned and Hawaiian work seriously crippled. For fiscal detail consult Geological Survey.

JAGGAR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
UNITED STATES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY,
Volcano House, Hawaii, January 29, 1932.

Hon. VICTOR HOUSTON,
Delegate from Hawaii,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. HOUSTON: I inclose herewith carbon of a telegram just sent to you.

As I am unacquainted with what the Secretary of the Interior and the Director of the Geological Survey are doing to meet the present crisis of reversal of Budget decisions, I can only refer you to the printed Budget with reference to fiscal matters. This shows that the estimate of $32,000 for volcanology in 1933 as compared with the actual of $21,000 of 1931 would carry two additional scientists and two field assistants not allowed for under a total appropriation of $21,000. To go back to that appropriation would dismiss these four persons.

With the increase of 60 per cent authorized for fiscal year 1932 we secured through the research association a new engineering building, new garage and carpenter shop, rebuilt the observatory with Government funds, appointed a Government engineer and a Government seismologist, and we have just completed a new seismograph station at Halemaumau pit, and all the new staff showed fine spirit and did good work in the new eruption of Halemaumau just finished. Mr. Finch last summer went from Lassen to Akutan Island in the Aleutians, made a good exploration and got good photographs of a hitherto unexplored crater, and inspected seismograph stations at Kodiak and Dutch Harbor. The section of volcanology was reorganized with Finch in charge of northwest volcanoes and Alaska, Wingate here in charge of seismology and engineering, Jones running the Hawaiian stations for seismology, Powers doing petrology of Hawaii, and myself in charge of volcanology and administration. All of this was complete reorganization.

Five higher officers are resident here, four with their own homes, and the janitor and mechanic in addition. The effect of reversion to $21,000 would be to obliterate the organization. Moreover, nothing more can be asked of the Volcano Research Association, which is likely barely to keep alive during the coming year. The Government has secured for 20 years all the loyal support of this association, and if it crashes now in the upkeep of what it is getting for $1 per annum, including publicity freely given through the published weekly of that association, it will be a deliberate dismissal of obligations. The plants can not be maintained on $21,000 a year without the men and supplies that go with the enlarged work. It is the kind of work, like astronomy, that calls for permanency.

Very respectfully,

T. A. JAGGAR, Volcanologist.

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 10, 1932.

Hon. V. S. K. HOUSTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. HOUSTON: In reply to your letter of February 1:

Doctor Jaggar's statement concerning the proposed reduction of the appropriation for volcanologic surveys to $21,000 and the effect of this reduction on the personnel engaged in that work appears to be essentially reasonable and inevitable.

During the three years 1929 to 1931, inclusive, when the annual appropriation was $21,000, the scientific and clerical personnel consisted of a volcanologist, an associate volcanologist, an assistant geologist, and a clerk, whose present salaries amount to a total of $14,100. The rest of the appropriation (about $7,000) provided in part the running expenses of the three stations, the headquarters station in Hawaii receiving about three-fourths, in addition to considerable funds contributed by local cooperating agencies, and the California and Alaska stations sharing the other fourth.

The increase to $35,000 in the appropriation for the year 1932 was intended to provide for additions to the scientific staff and for expanded activities in the Pacific Coast States, and especially in Alaska. Accordingly two appointments were made, an associate topographic and geodetic engineer at $3,200 and an assistant geologist (seismologist) at $2,600, bringing the salary roll up to $19,900. These are presumably the two scientists whose dismissal Doctor Jaggar thinks would be required by a reduction of the appropriation to $21,000. The abandonment of the Alaskan stations would release two local observers who look after the seismographs that have been installed there.

Very truly yours,

RAY LYMAN WILBUR.

Mr. HOUSTON of Hawaii. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say to the Delegate from Hawaii in justification of the action of the committee that we simply reduced the appropriation to what it was last year and the year before, namely, $21,000, instead of $32,000. That is a reduction of $7,115 in employees, $1,000 in traveling expenses, $1,000 in equipment, and $1,000 in construction. In other words, we thought that service, like a great many other activities of this Interior Department, should and could be reduced to what it had been during the two preceding years. We had no desire or intention of permanently crippling the work of Doctor Jaggar. This committee has a kindly feeling toward both him and his work.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, I realize full well what a hard task the chairman of a committee or the chairman of a subcommittee has in arriving at a proper method of reducing expenditures in any of the departments of the Government. Invariably when you call upon the head of a department to make a recommendation he is not willing to admit that he has more employees than are necessary to carry on the department in a proper way. Oftentimes he has to depend upon minor employees to gather statistical facts in order that he may make a report. So the object of my short address is to make a suggestion, and that is the only way, in my opinion, we will ever be able equitably to reduce expenditures in the various departments of the Government—having the thought in mind that the useless departments ought to be either reduced or abolished—is to appoint a joint committee, a committee composed of a number of Members of the House and a number of Senators, and give this committee sufficient power to sit and make such investigation of the various departments so that they may see at first-hand just what could be done along that line, having in mind that no department of the Government ought to be crippled, but that every department which is not functioning in the interest of the taxpayers should be reduced or abolished. Having that in mind, I have prepared just such a resolution and have introduced it to-day, suggesting that the Speaker appoint five Members and the President of the Senate appoint four Members, and that this committee be empowered to look into all the various departments of this Government, examine their files, those that are not of a confidential nature, and then report back to the various branches of Congress as to what their findings are, having in mind that it is going to be absolutely necessary for us to stop the enormous rate of increase in expenditures for which we are asked to appropriate every year.

I hope that the idea I have presented here to-day will find favor, because it will do the work if the right kind of a committee is appointed.

The Government is now facing a deficit of more than $2,000,000,000. A large percentage of our people are broke to the extent that they can not pay their taxes. Many are depressed in spirit to the extent that they are not going to accept any kind of an excuse that might be given by public servants should they try to escape the responsibility of reducing expenditures. Therefore, I am thoroughly of the opinion that millions of dollars can be saved and the efficiency of the Government not impaired if we will proceed along the line I have suggested.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I want to express the hope that we may be able to finish this bill to-day. The bill has been pending before the House for about three weeks, and if gentlemen will stay on the floor and restrain themselves as much as they conveniently can with respect to making speeches, I feel sure we can accomplish this.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, United States Geological Survey, $2,279,500.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLANCY: On page 78, line 21, strike out "$2,279,500" and insert "$2,179,500."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I have well in mind the admonition of the gentleman in charge of the bill, Mr. TAYLOR, of Colorado, that we should not waste any time this afternoon. We have had a lot of debate during the afternoon not directly on the bill. Possibly, what I am going to discuss is the only remaining debatable matter in the bill, but it is so important that I absolutely insist on taking enough time myself, if I may be recognized from time to time, to put my points before the House.

There is an amendment to be offered to the bill which I understand is to be tied to all appropriation bills, unchanged if possible, limiting the purchase of automobiles to $750 except for the White House or for a Cabinet Member, and there is another provision in the bill to prevent joy riding and the use of the cars for private purposes.

Both of these purposes, the limitation on the cost of the automobile and the prevention of joy riding or the use of a Government car or Government gasoline for private purposes, are worthy. All I object to is the language employed. If the limitation in the amendment were $950, this would overcome the very vigorous objections raised by the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of the Interior and particularly by the bureau chiefs; men who are not "politicians" in any sense of the word, and men of the very highest caliber, and men who know their business.

If you limited the language in the amendment to official use of the car, that would be all right; but you say that the cars must be used "exclusively" for official business, and when there is an emergency, for instance, in the Rocky Mountains—and there are hundreds of such emergencies each year in the very bureau that we are talking about—then they can not use private-owned cars as they have been using them. Suppose the Government car is broken down and there is an oil well afire, or there is a flood, or there is water pollution somewhere. You are spending hundreds of millions of dollars for these plains and Rocky Mountain services and yet your employees and officials could not go to the scene of trouble, nor to their work from their domiciles, nor return in the official car.

If you included language in the bill that the cars should be used for official business only, that would be all right, but the amendment goes further and says that the car can not be used from the domicile of an employee to his place of business; and when I pointed out in the debates recently that the President could not use his car under that language to go from his Rapidan camp to the White House, or a Cabinet member could not use his car when the President called him to come to the White House on an evening or Sunday, I reinforced my statement by quoting the Comptroller General, Mr. McCarl, that this is what the language meant, and then they withdrew their language so that the amendment which the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is going to offer to-day differs from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], in that Cabinet members are exempted from the whole amendment.

The Secretary of Agriculture states that it is economy in these rough regions to use a 3,000-pound car costing in the neighborhood of $950 or $1,000, and that he would be satisfied with a limitation of $950. The lowest-priced car is not economical.

I have no ax to grind with respect to this limitation placing the price at $750. All the great low-priced cars are made in my city or in my State, but I do happen to know enough about the automobile business to know that you are wasting money by placing this limitation at $750.

Why, the Secretary of the Interior gave us a statement that in the purchase of a car only a few weeks ago my contention was maintained. His department could not buy the cheapest closed Ford car in Shoshone, Wyo., although they were getting it at a cut price, under this limitation, because the freight was about $273 to Wyoming. When I spoke to the gentleman from Mississippi about this, he stated, "Oh, no; I did not mean that the $750 should include freight," but when I spoke to the Comptroller General, Mr. McCarl, he said that the $750 does absolutely include the freight.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment be closed in four minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. CLANCY. Right at this point, Mr. Chairman, I submit that the curtailment of debate on this amendment is unfair, because I am informed, even by a proponent, that possibly the language was not so good and that it would probably have to be changed in the Senate. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] himself suggested a few days ago that this bill was going to the Senate and that it might be changed over there. As a Member of the House, I listened to debates here recently when Members of the House said this is the more intelligent and capable body of the two, and I object to sending bad language over there, or destructive language, and leaving it to those busy gentlemen of the Senate to render the language harmless.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, sir; gladly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Of course, I will admit this is the more intelligent body, but the gentleman has made three speeches already on this amendment, which I have not yet offered, and it seems to me the gentleman should wait until the amendment is offered.

Mr. CLANCY. The gentleman not only says he is going to offer the amendment, but he has taken the attitude that so far as possible he is going to prevent adequate discussion of it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I have not said that.

Mr. CLANCY. Well, the gentleman has frequently objected to discussion. I demand to have discussion of it here. I have stated what the Secretary of the Interior says and what the Secretary of Agriculture says, and what the head of the Geological Survey says, in objecting to this amendment. I put it up to the experience of the gentleman from the plains and Rocky Mountains if the distances that these agents have to travel are not vast. The chiefs of the bureaus state themselves that three or four hundred miles is nothing for the Government employee to travel in a day, and when a man has to go to look after some emergency with respect to a burning oil well, a flood, or a case of water pollution, and has to travel 50 or 100 miles after he gets the telephone call, he should not be barred from traveling from his home to his work. It may be a forest fire or an injury to a person, but in any event, he can not use his official car to go to the place of the emergency, and when he gets there and may have to work several days and nights, as they often do, as the gentleman on the committee well knows, the language of the amendment forbids him going from the scene of the work to his home in one of these automobiles.

Now, I say that when you wreck the service out there in such bureaus as this, the Geological Survey, the National Park Service, the Alaska Service, the Bureau of Public Roads, I think it worthy of discussion. The introduction of an hour and a half of debate on general questions of economy, although we had a very good debate, and a very good leading speech by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], still I object to shutting off discussions of matters like this poorly drafted amendment.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I am in full accord with the attitude of the chairman of the committee to have this bill passed this afternoon. I rise to make a brief observation. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] interrogated the gentleman from Arizona as to the national wealth and national indebtedness of Great Britain, and the very able gentleman from Arizona stated that the national debt of Great Britain was about £7,000,000,000, which is substantially correct, or, to be exact, £7,596,000,000. But the gentleman from Arizona overlooked that part of the question propounded by the gentleman from Michigan in relation to the national wealth of Great Britain. It may be worth while to supply this information.

According to Sir Josiah Stamp, a great British economist, the national wealth of Great Britain is $122,000,000,000, and the national debt is $32,000,000,000, which would make the national wealth of Great Britain approximately $90,000,000,000.

May I call attention to the fact that the national debt of the United Kingdom is approximately 30 per cent of the national wealth of the United Kingdom, while in the United States the national wealth, according to the last statistics, is $330,000,000,000, and the national debt is only approximately 5 per cent of our national wealth.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is that the wealth of the United Kingdom or the wealth of Great Britain?

Mr. LOZIER. The United Kingdom. It is difficult to get the wealth of the British Empire, including its Dominions, because so much of its wealth is not actual but potential wealth. In 1913 the national wealth of the American people was $187,000,000,000, which in 1921 had grown to $330,000,000,000. In recent years our national wealth reached approximately $356,000,000,000, but according to recent reliable statistics, our national wealth has since declined to $330,000,000,000, or about what it was in 1921. I have made this statement comparing the wealth and indebtedness of the United States and Great Britain because of its bearing on our tax problem. While the United States debt is approximately only 5 per cent of our national wealth and the debt of Great Britain is approximately 30 per cent of the national wealth, the taxpayers of Great Britain are being more heavily taxed than the American people. But under the 11 years of prodigal and extravagant management of our national affairs by the Republican Party taxes have increased tremendously and have long since become unbearable.

The Clerk read as follows:

Carlsbad Caverns National Park, N. Mex.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $800 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $71,800; for construction of physical improvements, $57,000, and in addition thereto $13,000 of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for physical improvements for the fiscal year 1932 is continued available, including $20,000 for passenger elevator, not exceeding $19,000 for the construction of buildings, of which not exceeding $6,000 shall be available for a messhouse, $8,000 for improvements to employees' quarters, $5,000 for an addition to a bunkhouse; in all, $128,800.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Page 81, line 12, after the word "appropriation," strike out the words "for physical," and in line 13, strike out the word "improvements."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the officials of the Interior Department feel that that language should be slightly modified so as to avoid any question by the Comptroller General in respect to the expenditure of that money.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, in a section of the gallery of the House at the present time we have as our guests Sir Thomas Fearnley, of the International Olympic Committee; Dr. Cato Äll, of the Norwegian Olympic Committee; and Maj. S. J. Arnesen, of New York, of the American Olympic Committee. Accompanying them are six of the champion skiiers, representing the splendid nation and the fine people of Norway at the recent Olympic games at Lake Placid, N. Y. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Crater Lake National Park, Oreg.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $800 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $54,800; for construction of physical improvements, $33,200, of which $3,500 shall be available for an employees' quarters, $2,500 for a comfort station, $8,000 for a superintendent's quarters, $12,000 for a ranger dormitory, $6,000 for a machine shop and utility shed; in all, $88,000.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, on July 16, 1931, I had the good fortune to be a member of the congressional party which dedicated the memorial in Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., erected in memory of the late Nicholas J. Sinnott, Representative in Congress from Oregon and chairman of the House Public Lands Committee. Since all Members of the House of Representatives could not be present, I present herewith an account of the ceremonies, to make it a matter of congressional history.

The memorial is an attractive stone building on the rim of Crater Lake, which serves as an observation station and orientation point for all park visitors. In it soon will be installed, through the cooperation of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, exhibits and instruments, including telescopes, which will assist the visitor in interpreting the geologic history of Crater Lake.

The dedication ceremonies at the memorial were presided over by Horace M. Albright, Director of the National Park Service and a personal friend of Mr. Sinnott.

The proceedings were as follows:

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Members of the congressional party and other friends of Representative Sinnott, we have gathered here to-day to dedicate a great memorial to a great man.

As many of you know, Nicholas J. Sinnott was born in The Dalles, Oreg., December 6, 1870. Practically his whole life was one of public service. After a few brief years in the Oregon State Senate, he was elected to the Sixty-third and to the seven succeeding Congresses and served for several terms as chairman of the House Public Lands Committee. It was in that capacity that I met him and formed for him a lasting friendship.

In 1925, when the Appropriations Committee was in the Yellowstone, Mr. Sinnott was there also. He and I accompanied the committee to the top of Mount Washburn and there, gazing off at the wonderful panorama spread out before us, Mr. Sinnott quoted from the Bible—from the Book of Isaiah—the following verse: "I will make all my mountains a way, and my highways shall be exalted." I was so impressed with the appropriateness of this quotation that I had it printed on a movable sign placed on Mount Washburn for the use of visitors wishing to take pictures of the fire lookout station located there. The sign reads:

Mt. Washburn,
Altitude, 10,317 feet
"I will make all my mountains a way.
and my highways shall be exalted."
—Isaiah, chap. 49, verse 11.

This sign is held by people when having their pictures taken in their own automobiles or in busses on the top of Mount Washburn.

Mr. Sinnott loved his home country of Oregon, and particularly Crater Lake. Nowhere is this reflected more clearly than in his own words when on June 7, 1924, he addressed the House as follows:

"I wish I could take you out into my country and show you that the Almighty Himself meant the snows upon the mountains should be wedded to those broad areas of fertile volcanic dust. I wish you could see how amphitheaterlike the hills rise and radiate from the Colorado and the Columbia to the cardinal points. How hills pile on hills, how they rise in the purple haze of twilight like billows suddenly stilled on the crest; how the rim of the amphitheater and the horizon is pillared with a dozen lofty, eternally snow-capped peaks, once blazing beacons, now only reflecting above the dust of the valleys the soft glow of the setting sun as the day drops into the western waters of the Pacific. These snow caps eternal are our reservoirs; the Almighty invites us to wed the snow on those mountains with one vast area of fertile, volcanic dust." Sinnott, June 7, 1924, on Vale and Owyhee projects. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD p. 11221, pt. 11, vol. 65.)

I know that each Member of Congress here will want to say a few words about his late colleague, and so shall cut my own personal remarks short. I do, however, want to outline the history of the memorial. This beautiful little structure was made possible by the action of former Representative Louis C. Cramton, of Michigan, at that time chairman of the subcommittee of the House Appropriations Committee handling Interior Department appropriations, and his colleagues on the subcommittee, four of whom are here to-day. In the section of the Interior Department bill for 1931 relating to national-park appropriations, the subcommittee introduced an item reading: "And including not more than $10,000 shall be available for the Sinnott Memorial Rest."

In presenting this item, Mr. Cramton said on the floor of the House:

"In closing, let me tell you of one more item which I am sure will appeal to you. The Crater Lake National Park in the State of Oregon is a gem, where the peak of a mountain was knocked off and in the resulting crater lies a richly colored lake, one-half a mile below the rim. A great drive, 30 miles or more in length, is to carry you around that rim, and at the most desirable point on that rim, where a visitor to the park is likely to want to park his car and go out and take a look at this marvelous bit of scenery, there will be a telescope for his use, and we also have in mind, although these plans are only tentative, to place there a great stone bench, to stand there forever as a memorial to our late colleague, Hon. Nicholas J. Sinnott.

"He served in this House many years, was chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, and as such had the implicit confidence of this House.

"He rendered an outstanding service as chairman of the Joint Committee on the Northern Pacific Land Grants. He was always a great champion of the national parks. He visited many at great risk to his health. And so our committee has recommended that the Sinnott memorial rest be constructed. It is especially fitting that it should be in this park in Mr. Sinnott's own State, a park that he especially loved and which he described once in a speech in Congress in language of superlative beauty. It was in connection with the marshaling of the legal authorities that our late colleague made an eloquent speech on the Oregon country. In the course of it came his tribute to Crater Lake, which we proposed to have preserved at Sinnott Memorial Rest, in letters of stone or bronze, so that always and ever the visitor to Crater Lake may look at that scenic gem, then read Sinnott's words and look again. This tribute to Crater Lake is but a paragraph or two in an eloquent, poetic descriptive section which 'Nick,' as we knew him, inserted in a great speech he made on the water power bill. That speech was a masterly discussion of the recapture clause—the rights of the States and the Nation—a splendid legal argument,, a statesmanlike presentation.

"Then he turned to his loved Oregon, to his loved wide out-of-doors."

The item met with the unanimous approval of Mr. Sinnott's old colleagues.

The National Park Service immediately began the preparation of plans for the memorial, getting the best opinions possible on its location and construction. It was designed by Chief Landscape Architect Thomas C. Vint and Assistant Landscape Architect Merel S. Sager, of the National Park Service, and built by Superintendent Solinsky, of Crater Lake Park, with the assistance of engineers detailed from our San Francisco field headquarters. The little gem you see before you to-day is the result—something I am sure our old friend would be glad to have erected in his memory even on the rim of his beloved Crater Lake.

I will not take up any more of your time but will now call upon our distinguished guests, who wish to pay their personal tributes to Nicholas J. Sinnott. First we will hear Representative DON B. COLTON, of Utah, who succeeded Mr. Sinnott as chairman of the House Public Lands Committee. Mr. COLTON.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Albright, ladies, and gentlemen, those of you who knew Nick Sinnott as we Members of Congress knew him will realize that this is a fitting memorial to him. It is particularly appropriate.

Nicholas J. Sinnott was born at The Dalles, Oreg., December 6, 1870. He grew to manhood in that neighborhood. We are especially glad to know that some of his neighbors and boyhood friends have come up here to this dedicatory service. They can tell you a more intimate story of his young manhood. He was a great lover of the great out-of-doors. As a boy he took joy in going into the mountains, in fishing in the streams, and in roaming into the wild places of his native State, which he loved so well. When he grew to young manhood he spent his summer vacations working among the stock in the hills, and the strength of the hills somehow grew into his very system, so that he loved all nature. He was never happier than when he was communing with nature in God's great outdoors.

He went to school at The Dalles and the Wasco Independent Academy. He later entered the great school of Notre Dame in Indiana, maintained by the great church of which he was a member. He was a good student, a noted athlete; he loved the river, was a good oarsman and a good trackman. He made a name among the great athletes of the country. He graduated from Notre Dame in 1892, came back to Oregon, commenced the study of law, and was admitted to the bar in 1895. In 1901 he married Isadore Irene Purcell, of Rathdrum, Idaho. They had four children, one of whom preceded her father to the spirit world. He went into partnership with Judge Bennett. He stayed with this firm until elected to Congress in 1912. He practiced law all that time, except in 1909 and 1911, when he was in the State senate.

In 1912 Nicholas J. Sinnott was elected to the Sixty-third Congress and served there until elected to the Seventieth Congress. He was appointed by President Coolidge to the United States Court of Claims in May, 1928. It is of him as a Congressman that I shall speak to-day. I met Judge Sinnott prior to my election to Congress. I admired him from the beginning. He had a keenly analytical legal mind. He was a judge by nature as well as by training. He was chairman of the Public Lands Committee. He was an authority on the public land laws, and it was very seldom when a question came up that Judge Sinnott could not immediately tell us the date of the law covering the point and the place it could be found. He was broad of vision, with a national viewpoint. He was fair in debate, yet strong. He was always fair on matters that affected the Nation at large, and especially with reference to problems peculiar to the West. He did not want to take an unfair advantage but was content with having made the best fight possible and leaving the decision to the good judgment and fairness of his colleagues.

Some one has said, "He lives best who can meet sorrow without bitterness and not be coarsened by prosperity, who though defeated, fights on, or triumphant remains humble, and who carries into the deepening shadows of old age the hopefulness of youth, and who, when the sun was setting, his confidence of the morning. Such a man has lived well." Such a man was our friend, colleague, and brother. He knew well what it was to meet sorrow. Sorrow and defeat did not embitter him. His friends testify that success did not change his nature. They bear witness to-day that he was loved throughout his district.

He came of pioneer stock. I need not say much about that. I can only pause to say that in all the world's history there is no better, truer, or braver people than those who pioneered the great United States west of the Missouri River. Nick Sinnott came of that stock. His father, who was of Irish descent, came early to Oregon and established himself in business. He worked for the benefit of the community, as is the habit of that sturdy stock, as well as for himself.

When growing to manhood, Nick had a natural inclination along literary lines, making apt quotations, and when in a humorous mood he would often turn to Mark Twain. Very often he would quote from Shakespeare and from the Bible, and I believe his mind was of very much the same caliber as Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, who now sits upon the Supreme Bench of the United States. He could have turned his attention to literary pursuits and made a success of it, but he chose to make law his life's work. His study of the great authors was certainly one of his keenest delights. Attention is called to his description of the great Crater Lake which he loved so well:

"Cauldronlike and circular, 7,000 feet high, is perched amid the peaks. Perpendicular sides of slaggy lava rise over a thousand feet from waters of indigo blue 6 miles across and 2,000 feet deep."

"To the scientist, a mighty volcano collapsed within itself, Mount Mazama, 15,000 feet high, telescoped.

"To the poet, 'the sea of sapphire,' 'the sea of silence,' 'the lake of mystery.'

"To me, a shell hole of a war of worlds—who knows?

"Could the great blind poet have seen this marvel ere his pen had Lucifer and his host of rebel angels—

"'Hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal sky,

"'With hideous ruin and combustion down—'

"in Miltonic imagery here he'd have found the impact."

Somehow I can not help but believe that our comrade is pleased with this action to-day. I have not time, nor inclination, nor desire to philosophize long on the problems of life, and yet I do not think it would hurt to pause for a moment to give a beautiful thought from the drama of Ion: "The hope of immortality, so eloquently uttered by the death-devoted Greek, finds deep response in every thoughtful soul." When about to yield his young existence as a sacrifice to fate, his Clemantha asks if they should meet again, to which he replies: "I have asked that dreadful question of the hills that look eternal, of the clear streams that flow forever, of the stars among whose fields of azure my raised spirit has walked in glory. All were dumb; but as I gaze upon thy living face I feel that there is something in the love that mantles through its beauty that can not wholly perish. We shall meet again, Clemantha."

And so to-day I repeat again that our friend and companion is happy over this. To him we dedicate this beautiful edifice, so wonderfully appropriate, in this peaceful atmosphere, where all life seems to pulsate as in no other place. He saw sermons in these stones, he saw laughter in these brooks, he saw joy in the handiwork of Nature.

We offer this building to the great Government that he loved and served so well, and may the God of nature be kind to it and the elements preserve it as long as possible that it may long continue to be a monument to him and a blessing to all the people.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. We will now hear from members of the Appropriations Committee, who have made possible the carrying out of our plans at Crater Lake as well as in the other national parks through their sympathetic understanding of the problems and needs of these areas. First will be Representative MURPHY, chairman of the committee. Mr. MURPHY.

Mr. MURPHY. Director Albright and friends of Nicholas Sinnott, Nicholas Sinnott was my friend. Nicholas Sinnott was large of frame, with a splendid mind and a sense of humor that was not only a delight to his friends but I am sure was a comfort to him as he encountered the many obstacles which are thrown across the pathway of the life of every man. Nicholas Sinnott was true to the faith that he nursed from his mother's breast. He was truly a man of God. Gifted with a love for the great outdoors, he loved the woods, he loved the flowers, he loved the rugged mountains on whose trails he spent many hours. He enjoyed all the beauties of the great outdoors. His ear was attuned to catch the sweet music of the fluttering insects or the sweet-singing birds as their notes trilled their song of freedom. He enjoyed the fragrances of the sweet and beautiful wild flowers as they nodded to him when he passed by. He saw the beauties in the colors that fringed the lake that fills the crater of this rugged mountain top. Yes, Nicholas Sinnott was one of nature's noblemen; and what a suitable place this is to erect a building in memory of that sturdy American. But best of all is the monument of love that is already built deep in the hearts of those who knew Nicholas Sinnott best, and I think it is quite fitting and in place to have read to this assembly at this time the wonderful speech delivered in the National House of Representatives by the one whose memory we are honoring here to-day:

WHERE ROLLS THE OREGON

"Mr. Chairman, I want to see the development of the 40,000,000 horsepower accredited to the West, the 20,000,000 horsepower accredited to the Columbia River Basin. It was there I was born, at The Dalles, at the end of the old Oregon Trail, near the edge of what was once known as the Great American Desert. Here the beautiful panorama of the Columbia River spread before the pioneer. Here it was that the weary immigrant homeseeker after months of toilsome trekking across the plains 'shook the depths of the desert gloom with his hymn of lofty cheer' as the Columbia came into view.

"Here he embarked in the bateau of the Hudson Bay voyageur for the evergreen of the Willamette Valley.

THE INLAND SEA

"A great inland sea once covered eastern Oregon, Washington, and parts of Idaho, so geologists tell us, and immediately west of The Dalles it broke through the barrier of the Cascade Range in some titanic convulsion of nature.

"The Indian legend is that Mount Hood and Mount Adams, once espoused, engaged in a mighty marital combat, whose struggles broke the mountain barrier, and the inland sea disappeared through the gorge of the Columbia.

"The Indian's awe even now bears witness to the tribe's tradition. From his canoe as he glides through the Columbia's gorge he sees the two mythical mates of a Miocene age, Hood and Adams, now hiding behind the towering hills, ever and anon through favorable gaps in the gorge stealing furtive peeps each at the other.

"It may be so. Perhaps the Indian 'who sees God in the wind' witnessed some colossal cataclysm of nature. The surroundings bear evidence of the epochal. A broad river suddenly turns on edge at train speed, rushes through a gash in the lava flow. Palisades, a sheer thousand feet, dwarfing the Hudson's, rise from the water's edge. Giant causeways abound, dwarfing Erin's.

CRATER LAKE

"Southward, Crater Lake, 'the sea of silence,' cauldronlike and circular, 7,000 feet high, is perched amid the peaks. Perpendicular sides of slaggy lava rise over a thousand feet from waters of indigo blue 6 miles across and 2,000 feet deep. To the scientist a mighty volcano collapsed within itself; Mount Mazama, 15,000 feet high, telescoped.

"To me, a shell hole of a war of worlds.

"Could the great blind poet have seen this marvel ere his pen had Lucifer and his host of rebel angels—

'Hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal sky
With hideous ruin and combustion down'—

in Miltonic imagery here he'd have found the impact.

OUR RESERVOIRS

"Amphitheaterlike the hills rise and radiate from the Columbia to the cardinal points, hill piling on hill, rising in the blue purple haze of twilightlike billows, suddenly stilled on the crest, till the rim of the amphitheater and horizon from central Oregon is pillared with a dozen lofty, eternal, snow-capped peaks, once blazing beacons, now only reflecting above the dusk of the valleys, from lofty eminences of snow and ice, the soft pink glow of the setting sun as the day drops into the westward waters of the Pacific.

"These snow caps eternal are our reservoirs.

THE HAND OF THE GREAT ARCHITECT

"Whether you look at the sublime landscape with the eye of the scientist or through the Indian's legendary lore you see how the hand of the Great Architect hewed for the future.

"The waters, once slowly seeking the inland sea, now toss and tumble in cataracts from 'the Cascade's frozen gorges,' exhaustless in energy and power, awaiting man's will.

"I have seen much of the development of this part of the West—the final retreat of the Indians to their reservations, the departure of the cattle baron, the advent of the sheepman, the coming of the homesteader, each contesting proprietorship.

"Though we had many favored localities, we were wont to question the wisdom of the Master Hand that heaped the mountains when some sojourner told us of the easily tilled plains of the Corn Belt. When he spoke of the copious rains and abundant crops of his home we envied that clime and questioned the wasteful hand of the Great Architect that scattered the immense arid and semiarid belts and plateaus of the great inland empire. We could see no Divine foresight or plan in the great depth of prolific and fertile volcanic ash covering immense areas, devoid of all save a scanty rainfall, with snow-clad mountains pouring their inaccessible waters into deep gorges and canyons.

"From a scenic standpoint all seemed majestic and sublime, but we felt we were surfeited with scenery. From the point of utility we would have improved on the designs of the Great Architect.

"Our finite minds could not fathom the infinite purpose. We did not appreciate the 'precious jewel' in all that seemed ugly and forbidding when pioneer-day material wants alone were considered.

"The possibilities of 'white coal' were way beyond the ken of the pioneer; they are almost beyond the scope even of our own imagination. But we have at last come to a realization of the rich resources the prodigal and bounteous hand of nature has placed at our disposal.

"We are skeptics no longer.

"The development, through the slow processes of the past, the requirements of countless acres for the bleating, lowing herds, the slow upbuilding of a frontier by the weary and intermittent toil of the homesteader with meager means to improve, the idle year of the summer fallow, the drought, the parch and shrivel of the eastern wind, will no longer be witnessed if we are wise enough to pass laws to put the turbine in our mountain torrents, the life-giving waters on our arid, thirsty soils.

"Thus, and only thus, will His design be consummated 'where rolls the Oregon.'"

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Representative E. T. TAYLOR of Colorado, ranking Democratic member of the Interior Department subcommittee and perhaps its next chairman, served on the Public Lands Committee with Mr. Sinnott many years ago. Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. TAYLOR. Director Albright, ladies and gentlemen, it is really a very great privilege, a matter of pride, for the Members who know Nicholas Sinnott during his lifetime to be here and take a humble part in this ceremony. The thought that comes to my mind most forcibly on this occasion is this: In the first place, he was a many-sided man, and all of them were bright, all of them were commendable, all of them were lovable. And when a man of that type passes away—an honor to his State, an honor to his Congress, an honor to his country—when he passes away, it seems to me that it is particularly fitting and commendable that some tribute like this should be paid to him.

Do you realize that this is an inspiration to the youth of our State and our country? It is a stimulus to try to do things worth while. I can not but believe that if our Brother Sinnott could know of these ceremonies, he would appreciate them. He would rather have this than the highest monument that could be erected to him. This kind of a memorial will go on for succeeding generations, possibly for a thousand years or more. During all that time the State of Oregon will be proud of him, and the youth of the West will take inspiring courage and stimulation to be worthwhile citizens, as he was.

He was not only a great man but he was an encouragement to those who surrounded him. Congressman SMITH and I served with him in committee work for many years. There are some 435 Members of Congress. A great many we admire, some we look upon indifferently, but some stand out in our memories. Some, we feel, are superior Members. They are worth-while American citizens. Nicholas Sinnott was one of those. For that reason I feel that every Member of Congress who is living to-day and who served with Nicholas Sinnott would be proud if he could be here and take part in this ceremony. He would feel he was honoring himself, his State, and his country in having a part in so worthy an American tribute as we are paying to him to-day.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Representative BURTON L. FRENCH, of Idaho, is a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee and for years served on the Public Lands Committee. He ranks sixth in point of length of membership in the House.

Mr. FRENCH. Director Albright and friends, I am sure I voice the thought of all Members of Congress when I approve the beautiful fitness of the erection of a memorial in Crater National Park in memory of the services and character of Nicholas Sinnott.

I like to think of the Members of Congress being, as it were, a cross-section of the citizenship of our country. I believe that that is true. Those who have spoken to-day have indicated particularly the traits of character that drew Nicholas Sinnott to his colleagues and bound him to them with hoops of steel. They are the characteristics that we like to think of and that those who knew him will always cherish; and yet, may I call attention to just a few attributes of that strong personality that made his services such that Congress, his neighbors, and personal friends all desired a memorial to be erected in his honor?

There are people we love to whom memorials are not erected. In the Congress Members by their daily conduct define their relationship to that great body and to public service. The first attribute, as I see it, which must be possessed by a Member of Congress to assure eminence in that body is ability. Nicholas Sinnott was able in degree that was outstanding. The second attribute that must go with ability is willingness to work. Members of Congress can in large measure prescribe the work that they will do, the routine work that comes in from day to day, their contact with people from home, and the degree of their assumption of the larger responsibilities of State, of Nation, of the world. A man who would rise high in the estimation of his colleagues must impress them with tremendous earnestness, with fidelity to a purpose. Those qualities must permeate a man who comes to occupy high place in the estimation of those with whom his life is spent.

Finally a man who takes eminent place in the Congress of the United States must have not only ability in fine degree, willingness to work, and earnestness of purpose but in great measure that which is closely akin to the latter—courage of his convictions. Colleagues must know that he is a man trusted by his people to carry into execution the honest judgment to which his conscience leads him as he thinks of the problems of state and that his conviction as expressed is the conviction of his soul.

In conclusion, may I say that as Nicholas Sinnott was a man of powerful physical strength and stature, so too he was a giant in the intellectual, moral, and spiritual world. Even as the mountain summits that are about us lift themselves above the hills, so Nicholas Sinnott towered above his fellow men. It is eminently fitting that a memorial to his memory should stand in this rugged place from which the passers-by will gaze throughout the years upon mountain peaks, upon towering trees, upon nature in her grandest form.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. We will now hear from Mr. HASTINGS, Representative in Congress from the great public-land State of Oklahoma and a member of the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Director Albright and Oregon friends of the late Nicholas Sinnott, it is an unexpected privilege that I briefly participate in these ceremonies.

Nicholas Sinnott was a typical son of the West and a splendid Representative. I feel sure that no man who ever sat in the American Congress understood the great problems of the West any better than did Mr. Sinnott. As has already been stated, he was an authority on public lands, in which the States west of the Mississippi are so greatly interested. He knew the Indian question. He held the confidence of the Indians of the West to an extent enjoyed by but few men in the Congress of the United States. He sympathized with them and was of great assistance to them in securing legislation for their benefit. He was deeply interested in the Park Service, and there was not a single piece of legislation affecting this service enacted while he was in Congress that did not bear his imprint.

He was a careful legislator. He was a loyal friend of every citizen of his district, and he was as much beloved in Congress as he was in the district that he so effectively and so ably represented. There were but few men who represented a district in Congress that so whole-heartedly gained the confidence, affection, and esteem of the Members of the Congress of the United States as did Nicholas Sinnott. I am glad to be here upon this occasion and to briefly participate in these ceremonies, and to say to the people of Oregon and of the district in which he lived and which he so ably represented, that he was admired as much by his colleagues in the Congress of the United States as he was trusted by the splendid citizenship that he so long represented.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. We will next hear from Representative ADDISON T. SMITH, second ranking Member of the House Public Lands Committee and chairman of the House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, who was a long-time friend and associate of Representative Sinnott.

Mr. SMITH. Director Albright, my colleagues, and friends, I count it a rare privilege to have this opportunity of paying a tribute to my friend, Nicholas Sinnott. We came to Congress at the same time, 18 years ago last March, from adjoining States. We happened to be assigned to the same committees—Public Lands and Irrigation. I leaned upon him as I would upon a brother, because of his great ability and his experience in public affairs.

We have two kinds of statesmen—constructive statesmen and obstructive statesmen. Judge Sinnott belonged to the former class. He was always on the alert for legislation that would be constructive and that would be to the interests and happiness of the people, not only of his State but of the entire Nation.

It was my good fortune to travel with Judge Sinnott through this State four years ago, and in every town we visited in this district you could see evidence on all sides of the great esteem they had for him and the admiration in which he was held.

I recall many times in our Committees on Public Lands and Irrigation when it would seem to be absolutely impossible to reconcile the differences of opinion in regard to legislation. Oftentimes he would pick up a pencil and a pad of paper while the others were wrangling and prepare an amendment or a change in the phraseology which would make it possible for us to agree.

He was also a diplomat. I have known times on our committee when it appeared that it would be impossible to carry on the business in a fair manner * * * but by a few well-chosen words he was able to pour oil on the troubled waters and bring us what we all so much desired, and that was legislation that was in the interest of all the people of this country.

I loved Nicholas Sinnott as a brother, and it was my great privilege, when he was serving his last few hours, to make a statement of his great work, and that statement was followed by others of his colleagues. I don't think we wanted to see him retire, because we felt that the House would not be the same with Nicholas Sinnott away, but he seemed to feel he wanted to accept the position that was tendered to him by President Coolidge. But I always felt that he would rather have stayed among us instead of gracing the bench, as he did.

I am glad of the opportunity of meeting with his friends here and joining in these splendid tributes to a man outstanding in our country.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Representative ROBERT LUCE, of Massachusetts, is chairman of the House Committee on the Library, which, in addition to its duties in connection with the Library of Congress, also is charged with the regulation of monuments to the memory of individuals, battlefield monuments, and the general affairs of the Smithsonian Institution. Mr. LUCE.

Mr. LUCE. The just, the accurate, the wonderfully beautiful appreciation of Nicholas Sinnott by Representative COLTON; the eloquent words that have been spoken by Members of Congress that were closest to him in daily work—eloquent because, as you all knew, springing from the heart—leave me but little to add.

They have dwelt on Nicholas Sinnott as a representative of the West, as a typical man of the West. Perhaps I may take it upon myself to broaden that somewhat and testify to the appreciation not alone of the West, not alone of the East, but of the country as a whole as embodied in the House of Representatives—take it upon myself to testify to our gratitude that he was a Member of the House, to our gratitude that he did love nature, that he did have some share in preserving for ages to come the beauty spots of our land.

As I came in view of this one yesterday I thought of the words of Keats: "Beauty is truth; truth, beauty. This is all you know and all you need to know." The day had not ended before I found there was something more than beauty to reveal all the truth that the observer may well know. The geologist told us that in ages past there was here such a terrible catastrophe as the mind can hardly imagine. All the forces of fury raged about this spot. To-day we find the records of that catastrophe written on these towering walls.

But what do they enshrine? A sheltered, placid lake, a thing of beauty, a thing of peace. There is a phrase often heard in the service of the church to which Nicholas Sinnott belonged: "Pax vobiscum—Peace be with you." And here, too, we say to him, "Peace be with you. May your soul rest in peace. May your name on this tablet ever symbolize the peace it overlooks. May this beautiful, appropriate tribute, through years upon years to come, tell mankind that after the strife of life, after all its turmoils and struggles, there comes a crowning glory—peace."

After the Members of Congress paid their tributes to their late colleague, several Oregon friends of Mr. Sinnott were introduced, among them Mr. John Hampshire, of Grants Pass, Oreg., who played with him as a boy. Judge Will G. Steel, United States Commissioner, another old friend, briefly addressed the gathering and gave some interesting historical data about the Crater Lake National Park and Mr. Sinnott's work on several legislative measures relating to it.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Mr. W. P. Sinnott, cousin of our late friend, will now tell us something of his personal life.

Mr. SINNOTT. Chairman Albright, members of congressional committee, and friends of Nick Sinnott, I have little to add to the eloquent tributes paid by Mr. COLTON and the other speakers to the memory of Nicholas Sinnott.

Mr. COLTON has told you that he came from good pioneer stock. He was born about the time that our far-famed Crater Lake was discovered. Nick's father and mother had much to do with the upbuilding of the then eastern Oregon country. Col. N. B. Sinnott, Nick's father, was, no doubt, the best-known man in the West in those days. He took an active part in all movements making for the security and well-being of the settlers. His fish stories and Indian tales were welcomed by many of the leading papers and magazines of the country. He was a friend of the Indians and assisted the soldiers in settling the Bannock uprising and other Indian troubles. General Howard and other United States officials sought his mediation in dealing with the Indian chiefs. The Dalles at that time was a frontier town, with no railroad. Stages, small steamboats, and pack trains were operated from this primitive distributing center. The pioneers were a hardy and honest people. Nick's parents were stanch members of the Catholic Church and Nick went through life an active and loyal member of his church. Colonel Sinnott assisted all denominations in establishing their missions, and many of the circuit riders were his warmest friends. It was under these conditions that Nick was raised—in a frontier town, surrounded by the ennobling influences of a good Christian home.

Nick was fond of outdoor life. Fishing, hunting, boating, athletics of all kinds found in him a devoted and strenuous patron. My father, P. B. Sinnott, was United States Indian agent at the Grand Ronde Reservation in Polk and Yamhill Counties, and Nick and his brother Roger, now deceased, and I spent the summer months exploring the country and learning much about the different Indian tribes. We roamed aimlessly over the country, climbing peaks, traveling through forests, up canyons, fishing and hunting, sleeping under trees, with the heavens for a roof, and Nick loved it all, finding "tongues in trees, sermons in stones, books in running brooks, and good in everything." He wandered all through eastern Oregon as a boy, and often made the difficult trip from The Dalles to Lost Lake, west of Mount Hood. Nick was a leader in The Dalles Volunteer Hose Team and competed in all State tournaments. He entered his ponies in many races with the whites and Indians and played shinny with the natives. You have been told he was a famous football player, trackman, and oarsman at Notre Dame. It was this outdoor life and love for athletics that accounted for his wonderful physique.

He had a good singing voice, sang in the Catholic Church choir, and took part in many private theatricals with great success. After graduating from Notre Dame he took up the study of law and was admitted to the bar. While a partner of Judge Bennett, Nick made a study of conditions in his district, and as a result of what he learned he resolved that if he were elected to the State legislature he would secure the passage of laws that would be of substantial benefit to his district. He offered himself as a candidate for State senator, was elected, and during the four years of his incumbency he accomplished so much for his district and the State at large that his friends urged him to run for Congress.

Following his election, he told me that he wished to become a member of the Public Lands Committee, and the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee, and he achieved this ambition. At first he encountered difficulty in securing aid from Congress. All the arid land was in his district and 11 other Western States—far removed from the center of government and the solicitude of Congress; but his persistent advocacy enlightened and persuaded his colleagues, and he soon became known as the "champion of the desert lands."

The East had only one national park and no national monuments, under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. The voting power in the House and Senate was from the thickly populated East, and the eastern representatives were not directly interested in appropriations for irrigation projects and national parks. Nick finally induced the Public Lands Committee of the Senate and House to visit the West and obtain firsthand information about these great undertakings. He personally took congressional committees to view the irrigation projects in Idaho, Washington, and Oregon, and the various national parks of the Northwest. What they saw was a revelation to them. Several years later these committees again visited the West. From then on there was little trouble in securing appropriations.

When Nick entered Congress it was almost impossible to reach any of the parks, and once there the accommodations were poor and roads and trails few and in bad condition. He made every effort to improve these conditions. As money was made available, roads and trails were provided and important points of interest made accessible. Public-utility operators built hotels, lodges, and camps. Nick's mind was on the parks—he was eager to improve them. About seven years ago I returned from a trip which took me through Kootenai and Waterton Parks in Canada, Glacier, Yellowstone, Zion, Bryce, Grand Canyon of the Colorado, Yosemite, and other parks in the United States, and Mr. Stephen Mather happened to be in Portland when I returned. Nick asked me to meet with them and they both encouraged me to suggest anything I thought would improve conditions as I found them. They asked about roads, trails, guides, horses, hotels, camps, and general service in the parks. Their ambition was to make the parks attractive places for all the people and to give them as much as was humanly possible at as little cost as possible. I spoke of the wonderful service received at Going-to-the-Sun Chalet at the head of Marys Lake in Glacier Park some 50 miles from a railroad. They knew all about the woman who managed the chalet, showing how well informed they were about conditions in the different parks.

During the past 15 years the national-park system has made great forward strides and to-day it is the wonder and delight of thousands of tourists. People from all over the world may now enjoy a healthful outing at little expense in any of the parks.

No finer men can be found anywhere than those connected with the park service. From the superintendent down, all are courteous and anxious to assist and explain everything about their park—its flora and geological story. To-day several rangers, strangers to me, voluntarily proffered their assistance. They talked interestingly of the history and geology of the park and the surrounding country and helped us in every way possible.

The park system as it is to-day was the dream of Nick Sinnott 15 years ago. Thank God he lived to see the fruition of his devoted efforts.

He gave great credit to all the superintendents and employees of the parks. He spoke appreciatively of Mr. Albright, and expressed the great admiration he had for him and his ability to carry on the work assigned to him. During his last illness he was happy to realize that his work would be carried on by Mr. Albright, your committee, and by many others, all loyally devoted to the progress of our national park system.

Knowing the Indians as he did, and speaking Chinook fluently, Nick enjoyed their confidence and good will and was of great assistance to the Indian Affairs Committee. He was also a valued member of the important House steering committee.

Nick was a man of quiet, unassuming manners and extremely simple in his tastes. The following incident is typical of him: He was making a trip through his district with a companion. He wore an old suit of clothes with a blue wool shirt. His car gave him some trouble and he had crawled under it when two sheep herders came along. Nick's companion called to the two herders, "I want to introduce you to Nick Sinnott, your Congressman." Nick stuck his head out from under the car. The sheep herders looked at each other incredulously and rejoined in unison, "What in hell are you trying to put over on us?"

Nick was level headed and a hard worker. He was in his office from early morning until late at night and attended to all details of his daily grind. He was a deliberate thinker and noted for his good judgment. He was trusted by everyone, and especially by the associates of his boyhood days who knew him best. He had the confidence of his colleagues irrespective of party. This confidence enabled him to secure the passage of legislation that was of great benefit to Oregon. He reported from his committees about 500 bills and all but 80 passed—a record indicating the confidence placed in him by both Houses of Congress. He was an expert on public land laws and drafted many of the oil leases. During his 20 years of public service to his State and the Nation he was untouched by any breath of scandal, and no one ever even accused him of any wrongdoing. From childhood he knew intimately the people of his district and the surrounding country—Indians, farmers, stockmen, miners—and they were all his friends; they admired and loved him and did not address him as "Congressman" or "Judge," but naturally and fondly as "Nick."

He felt keenly the fight that was made against him on account of his Catholic faith by officers of the Ku Klux Klan. They used their own disreputable methods to defeat him, but many old-time friends stood by him, including some who had unwittingly joined the organization. Knowing his honesty and integrity and what he had accomplished for the State and Nation, they refused to desert him, and the hostility of the Klan forces actually served to strengthen the loyalty of his friends and increase the majority which returned him to Congress.

Following his last campaign, he told me that he would not stand for reelection because it aroused feelings which he deplored, but that he would ask for an appointment as judge instead. President Coolidge was loath to appoint him as a judge of the Court of Claims because he felt that Nick was a needed leader in Congress. His many important decisions proved him to be a jurist of the highest order and his untimely death was a loss to the entire Nation.

It is fitting, therefore, that our Government should honor Nicholas Sinnott by erecting this building of Oregon stone to his memory. It is a fitting symbol of the solid lifework of a native son. It is just as he would like it to be. It is so well constructed that it will stand for endless years. A better location than Victor Rock could not be selected—this point a thousand feet above Nick's crown jewel, Crater Lake—and overlooking the beautiful Cascade Range with its many towering peaks. This memorial will be a haven for the tired and weary.

The museum exhibits to be installed here will contain not only objects from Crater Lake National Park but exhibits from other parks. They will be of intense interest to visitors, especially geologists and students. The memorial will be an inspiration to all those connected with the National Park Service.

The erection of this memorial was made possible by you, friends and colleagues of Nick Sinnott, who knew his worth and the sacrifices made by him in an effort to make the parks what they are to-day—a paradise for the people.

In behalf of Mrs. Sinnott and her family who are in Washington, D. C., and are unable to attend this dedicatory service, I want to thank Mr. H. M. Albright, Director of the National Park Service, and each member of the committee, all of whom have spoken so eloquently and feelingly of the integrity, honesty, and memorable services of a worthy colleague. I also want to thank the students of the University of Oregon for the beautiful selections so well rendered during the dedicatory ceremonies, and you, his friends, who have come from all parts of Oregon and the West to honor his memory. It is a remarkable tribute and it shows the esteem in which you treasure the character and life work of a good and useful man.

I also wish to thank Mr. E. C. Solinsky, superintendent of Crater Lake National Park, and his coworkers—all true friends of Nick Sinnott—who have so admirably arranged these beautiful dedicatory ceremonies and made this a memorable and inspiring occasion for us all.

Upon the completion of these speeches the plaque was unveiled by little Jane Solinsky, daughter of Superintendent E. C. Solinsky, of Crater Lake National Park. Since all were not close enough to read the wording of the tribute on the plaque, Mr. Albright read it aloud, as follows:

Sinnott memorial, erected by authority of Congress in memory of Nicholas J. Sinnott, 1870–1929; Member of Congress from Oregon, 1913–1923; friend of the national parks, author of many national park laws, including the first general national park highway act of April 9, 1924.

"Crater Lake, cauldronlike and circular, 7,000 feet high, is perched amid the peaks. Perpendicular sides of slaggy lava rise over a thousand feet from waters of indigo blue 6 miles across and 2,000 feet deep.

"To the scientist, a mighty volcano collapsed within itself, Mount Mazama, 15,000 feet high, telescoped.

"To the poet, 'the sea of sapphire,' 'the sea of silence,' 'the lake of mystery.'

"To me, a shell hole of a war of worlds—who knows?

"Could the great blind poet have seen this marvel ere his pen had Lucifer and his host of rebel angels—

'Hurled headlong flaming from the ethereal sky,
With hideous ruin and combustion down—'

in Miltonic imagery here he'd have found the impact,"
—Congressman Sinnott, in House of Representatives, August 20, 1918.

Mr. Albright then declared the ceremonies adjourned.

The Clerk read as follows:

Grand Teton National Park, Wyo.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $700 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $27,900; for construction of a comfort station, $2,000; in all, $29,900.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the committee a very unusual condition. We have just read the item having to do with appropriating money for the Grand Teton National Park, in Wyoming. This is a very wonderful park. When we visited there last summer we found that the residents of the great State of Wyoming, where this park is located, were voicing some objection to one of our great philanthropic Americans buying up the land adjacent to these mountains and making a present of the same to the Government of the United States. In contrast to that, when we visited Carlsbad, in New Mexico, we found that the city of El Paso, in Texas, in another State, 150 miles away, had appropriated thousands upon thousands of dollars to build a road from El Paso to reach the Carlsbad caverns, realizing that they were a great asset.

The Federal Government, the State of Texas, and the city of El Paso, recognizing the great drawing power of that national park, have expended more than a million dollars in building roads to get to it. As I say, when we went into the State of Wyoming, we found a wonderful place, the greatest mountain scenery that we have within the continental boundaries of the United States, that the people there were objecting to the United States Government being made a present of thousands upon thousands of acres of land for which Mr. Rockefeller paid from three times to eight times its tax value to the people who owned it, all for the purpose of giving it to the Government to make a great natural refuge for wild and large game in America. We did not know what the trouble was, and we do not know now, but I think the House ought to know why we have not appropriated more money for this particular activity. Mr. Rockefeller spent about $1,000,000 of his own money buying up this land in order to present it to the United States Government, as I say, for the purpose of creating a great game preserve, and also to preserve the approach to this magnificent range of mountains, the most wonderful of its kind in all America. I think the House ought to know the situation so that if Members visit that section next summer they will understand why the park appropriation had been cut down.

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I listened with a great deal of interest to what my colleague from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] has said in respect to the people of Wyoming being opposed to the expenditure of the $2,000,000 which was set aside by the Rockefeller Institute for the purpose of buying lands in Wyoming, to extend it to the Teton National Park. It is true that the people of Wyoming are opposed to it, and I will state the reason why. When the Grand Teton National Park was created, it was specifically stated in the act that there were to be no concessions there at all. As soon as we found Mr. Rockefeller's plan was to spend $2,000,000, we learned that he did not buy it in the name of the Rockefeller Foundation, but he formed what was known as the Snake River Land & Cattle Co. After they formed that company and bought up land, they formed the Teton Investment Co. and the Teton Transportation Co., and the Teton Hotel Co. After these lands were purchased by Mr. Rockefeller we found that concessions were given to these various corporations, and that when this land would be included within the Teton National Park they would have a monopoly of the concessions. Let me show how far they have gone in order to get control of these concessions. One day I went down to see the Assistant Secretary of the Interior to protest against the issuing of a permit for the Teton Transportation Co.

Usually when I visit the various departments and present a matter to them, the matter is taken under advisement, but in this case, instead of getting an answer from the Department of the Interior, I received a telegram from a couple of politicians in Wyoming, asking me to "lay off." That is the extent to which the Rockefeller crowd has gone to control the lands in Wyoming. This land is not park land at all. For many years this land has been designated as grazing land, and has been allowed under the homestead law.

These lands are in ranches that have been in existence for many years. The real thing behind this plan is not to add land to a park that should belong in a park, but they want to get control of the big-game country of Wyoming. I believe the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] is correct in his statement that at first this appears to be a very laudable plan, but when we find out what is behind it, I do not believe it is as philanthropic as those people want us to believe.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I shall be glad to.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman just stated this is what Mr. Rockefeller wanted. Are we to understand that this is an individual member of the Rockefeller family, and, if so, which one?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Yes. John D. Rockefeller. He has set aside $2,000,000 in the Rockefeller Foundation for the purpose of buying this land and then turning it over to the Government. There is a contractual obligation that when this land goes into the park the concessions go with it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the land will be exempt from taxes in the gentleman's State?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I do not know whether that would be exempt or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean to convey to the country that Mr. Rockefeller himself, proposes to have this money used with those strings attached to it?

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. I do not know. The concessions are given to the various corporations that were formed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not know the aged gentleman who is summering down in the climes of Florida, but I have never heard it charged——

Mr. CARTER of Wyoming. Oh, no. It is John D. Rockefeller, jr.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was about to say I had never heard it charged against the elder Rockefeller that he would make any such unreasonable conditions on any gifts he had made. I suppose now that the State of Wyoming, in its majestic right, has exercised its determination over internal affairs, Mr. Rockefeller has withdrawn his proposal and is not pressing the gift.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. In view of the statement made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. CARTER], I am constrained to tell a little story of what I discovered when we were in Wyoming.

We learned that there was one particular place that the Rockefeller interests were trying to buy alongside of a road now in existence, and there was a little cemetery there in which rested the remains of some pioneer's little family. The heirs to this particular piece of property told the Rockefeller interests they would gladly sell if they would allow that little cemetery to remain there. The Rockefeller interests did, for sentimental reasons, allow this particular plot of ground where the remains of this old prospector or pioneer rested to be kept out of their purchase from this man. What happened? There is a gasoline station on it now, something that Mr. Rockefeller and those who represented him have been trying to keep out of the near approach to these wonderful outdoor places, which Mr. Rockefeller and the National Park Service are trying to preserve for posterity.

That was told to us as an actual fact, and I am sure, if it is not true, the gentleman from Wyoming may correct me.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Proposed Great Smoky Mountains National Park, N. C., and Tenn.: For administration and protection of the portion of the area of such proposed park the title of which has been vested in the United States under the provisions of section 3 of the act of May 22, 1926 (U. S. C., title 16, sec. 403b), including not to exceed $300 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for use in connection with such work, $30,000.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I consider it my duty to say that now we are reading 16 pages of the bill covering 25 park projects, and for each project there is an appropriation for automobile uses. I have a letter from the Acting Associate Director of the National Park Service, Hon. A. E. Demaray, saying flatly that all of this service practically will be harassed or injured or wrecked if this amendment is adopted, and he calls attention to the fact that these parks are in remote regions. They are at high altitude in many cases. They are covered with rough mountain roads and trails.

They require a rugged car, a high-powered car, and that the lowest-price car will not do the work, according to much experience. There are no towns or cities near by. It is hard to get repairs or supplies. They often have to carry four or five people and much heavy baggage. They work long hours. They have to operate over grades as high as 20 per cent.

If there is a man shot or a man injured in a fall or in any other way, or if there is a flood or if there is a forest fire or any other contingency such as arises as a matter of everyday work, the amendment which is proposed against using his car from his home to his place of business renders that service null and void. Millions are spent to obtain a service, and when that service is needed it can not be used.

Under leave to extend my remarks, I insert a memorandum from the acting chief of the National Park Service.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
NATIONAL PARK SERVICE,
Washington, January 30, 1932.

Memorandum for Mr. Burlew:

A limitation of $750 for a completely equipped passenger automobile would, in the case of the National Park Service, be a severe handicap.

The national parks and monuments are located in widely separated areas and most of them are in remote locations at high altitudes in heavy mountainous country. Many of the parks cover large areas and since they are located in heavy mountain country the travel from one point to the other within the park is circuitous and requires long trips to carry on the park work at all places within the park. At present many of the park roads are steep, rough mountain roads—requiring cars of rugged construction and well-powered to negotiate them.

On account of the location of the parks and monuments, generally far from outlying centers of population and supply, it is necessary for the park officials to travel by automobile for long distances in carrying on official business. Public transportation is not available with direct routing and schedules to make their use economic. Some of the park superintendents have the administration of more than one area, which requires them to get back and forth to these areas in as short a time as possible.

For the greater portion of the work in the parks where passenger-carrying cars are needed the car must be built for rough usage over rough, steep mountain roads, and it is necessary at times on these trips to carry four or five people with their baggage for overnight stops. The car must be large enough to carry the load without overloading. It must be exceptionally well constructed, so that it will not be weakened by hard usage and soon reach a poor state of repair. On practically all of the trips which the park superintendents and his officers make in the parks and to points outside of the park, the trip and work connected with it require long hours if anything is to be accomplished in a reasonable time. At the very best these trips are hard on the occupants even when made in a reasonable size car, and when long trips are made in a light automobile the physical strain is more than one can stand and at the same time carry on the work which has been occasioned by the trip. The high altitude and steep grades and heavy loads require a car with plenty of power and entirely reliable mechanism. The cheaper cars shake to pieces and early become in poor repair, and repair garages are few and far between on the roads over which the park officials travel, and servicing is very expensive and involves a great loss of time.

There are a number of general field officers in the National Park Service whose duties require that they not only travel from park to park but they must cover a considerable area within the parks which they visit. These officials are on extended trips, and carry considerable baggage, and ofttimes equipment. The distances traveled are so great that comfortable transportation becomes a necessity if the official is to be in any condition for work when he arrives at his destination. A rugged, well-powered, closed car of comfortable wheel base is not only required but is an actual necessity.

In writing up proposals for the purchase of cars the National Park Service generally specifies to meet the requirements of the Government a car of sufficiently long wheel base and design to permit long distances to be covered with comfort. It is also provided that the car must be well powered to negotiate steep grades, ranging as high as 20 per cent, and rough roads in high altitudes, carrying a heavy load. Also it must be of rugged construction and of good materials, so as to be dependable during hard usage. It would be impossible to secure this type of car, completely equipped, delivered ready for operation for not to exceed $750. At the present we are being allowed $1,200, which is the minimum amount found to be necessary to buy cars meeting our needs.

A. E. DEMARAY,
Acting Associate Director.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hot Springs National Park, Ark.: For administration, protection, maintenance, and improvement, including not exceeding $1,300 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $83,200; for construction of physical improvements, $4,500, which shall be available for dressing booths and comfort station; in all, $87,700.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like at this point to express my appreciation not only to the committee who has carefully taken care of this park but also to the Interior Department that has taken a special interest in advertising not only the Hot Springs National Park but is assisting us in advertising it as the greatest national health resort in the world. I doubt if there is any other activity of the National Government at any place that is reaching the needs of humanity and helping to cure its ills as the hot waters of this national park—Hot Springs National Park, Ark. It is not like the pool of Siloam that has to be troubled in order to get into it and be healed, but the waters there are troubled at all times. You can get into them day and night. It is not an absolute panacea for all of the ills of the world, but there are many of the ailments of humanity that are cured, and quickly cured, there.

I know that very few of the Members ever get sick, but if they have occasion to take a good rest in the mountains, where there is good water, where there are the finest hotels in the world, hotels as good as those in the city of Washington or New York, and where there are the finest people who ever met a stranger and who know how to entertain them, and I want you to come down to Hot Springs National Park and let us entertain you for a while, and you will visit there at least once every year. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Platt National Park, Okla.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $300 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $22,700; for construction of physical improvements, $8,900, of which not exceeding $1,900 shall be available for two comfort stations and $7,000 for a superintendent's residence; in all, $31,600.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWANK: On page 86, line 13, after the word "improvements," strike out the sign and figures "$8,900" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$11,900"; and, in line 15, after the word "all," strike out the sign and figures "$31,600" and insert in lieu thereof the sign and figures "$34,600."

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, in offering this amendment I realize that in this bill the Committee on Appropriations for the Interior Department has recommended $8,140,620 for the National Park Service, which is $1,136,400 less than the Budget estimate. The Bureau of the Budget has recommended $34,600 for Platt National Park for the fiscal year 1933, and I believe this amendment should be adopted and the amount increased in this case to the Budget estimate.

In making appropriations for national parks I believe that Congress should take into consideration not only the beauty of the park and the preservation of the natural scenery but should give consideration to the benefit the park renders our citizens, who pay the money for the maintenance of our national park system. Permit me to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in 1931 Platt National Park had 325,000 visitors, and was exceeded in the number of visitors by only one other park, which was Yosemite, with 461,855 visitors, yet for this fiscal year Yosemite received $558,600 and Platt received $35,900. This same year 151,267 automobiles entered Yosemite and 100,000 entered Platt Park. For the same year Platt had 68,140 campers, which was exceeded by but three other national parks. For 1931 Yellowstone National Park had 221,248 visitors, and for this fiscal year received an appropriation of $560,800.

Many improvements have been made in Platt National Park during my service in Congress and the appropriations have been increased from $7,500 per year, when the people first sent me here, to the amount recommended in this bill. The annual report of the Director of the National Park Service states that the most important improvement during the year was the installation, at a place remote from the town and the park, of a sewage disposal plant and sprinkler filter. This cost $45,000 and was paid by the State of Oklahoma, the city of Sulphur, and the Park Service. Many improvements have also been made at Bromide Springs. The road through the park, north and south, 1.3 miles in length, was paved jointly by the State and park at a cost of $18,000. Davis Avenue, at Rock Creek Crossing, was paved at a cost of $3,000, and all gravel roads of the park were regraveled and oiled at a cost of $6,000.

Gentlemen of the committee, this is one of the most important parks in the United States. It is not so large as Yosemite or Yellowstone, but I believe renders more real service to the people. In addition to its natural scenery and beauty, it is nationally known for the curative properties of its mineral springs.

People of modest means can go there and be restored to health as thousands do each year. They can camp in this beautiful park at little cost, bathe for nothing in the waters, and drink the health-giving waters from the many springs. For the fiscal year 1933 the committee has recommended a reduction from the Budget estimates for Yellowstone from $535,800 to $528,800, and for Yosemite from $412,200 to $399,200. I just call the attention of the committee to these facts to show the difference in the amounts recommended for these three parks, and I believe the difference is too great when we consider the number of visitors to each park and the benefit rendered the people by the parks.

Platt National Park contains 848.31 acres and was created by acts of Congress of July 1, 1902, and April 21, 1904. At the city of Sulphur there is also located the Oklahoma School for the Deaf and a sanatorium and hospital for soldiers of the World War. This is one of the finest hospitals in the entire country, and the Legislature of Oklahoma appropriated more than $270,000 for its construction. The hospital has many improvements and is in charge of a staff of most competent physicians, surgeons, and nurses. It gives our soldiers first-class treatment in every respect. The legislature located this hospital at Sulphur after an extensive and exhaustive survey by a board of competent physicians. There is no more healthful place than Platt National Park. It has more than 30 mineral springs and is a most noted health resort. People can go to Platt National Park, where they will find pure water, bromide and medicine water, and all kinds of sulphur water. One of these artesian wells flows 2,500 gallons of pure sulphur water per minute, and Buffalo Springs flows 5,000,000 gallons of pure water per day. In this park people can recuperate and recover their lost health at little expense.

Sulphur has two railroads and is traversed by the Ozark Trail and the Bankhead Highway. It is near the historic Washita River and the Arbuckle Mountains. This is a park of great natural beauty, but its chief value is in restoring people to health. I hope the committee will recommend this additional amount as provided in my amendment and restore the appropriation to the Budget estimate.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, that reduction was made in this appropriation because they were asking for some ornamental columns at the entrance to the park. We did not think the present time was appropriate to spend money for that purpose. They also proposed to repair and remodel the superintendent's residence, which we thought could wait for a year or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sequoia National Park, Calif.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $1,200 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, $113,600; for construction of physical improvements, $16,200, including not exceeding $12,200 for the construction of buildings, of which not exceeding $2,700 shall be available for two comfort stations, $4,500 for a ranger cabin, $5,000 for a mess house and dormitory; in all, $129,800.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman a question. I notice the Budget estimate for the Sequoia Park was cut $4,700. Was that just an arbitrary cut or was it some item that was cut out of the estimate?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We cut out some requests for additional improvements. They made a request for $3,500 for a new barn and some other things. I do not think we made any material cut in the operation or maintenance items. We have disallowed a great many requests for additional constructions of various kinds. We have refused appropriations for new developments which we thought could be put off until this financial depression is over.

Mr. BARBOUR. I was curious to know just what that cut was and what it represented.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, President Roosevelt named Colorado "The Summer Playground of the Nation," and I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in connection with the Rocky Mountain National Park and to include in the RECORD some data I have concerning the millions of people who visit that park.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DATA ON TOURIST TRAVEL, ETC.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I offer at this point a letter addressed to me from D. R. Griggs, secretary of the Colorado Association of Denver, inclosing statement of study made of the tourist business of this park.

THE COLORADO ASSOCIATION,
Denver, Colo., January 8, 1932.

Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: We have just sent the following telegram to Horace M. Albright, Director of the National Park Service, in Washington:

"Have just completed statistical study of tourist business and manner in which it contributes to year-round livelihood of Colorado people. This shows over 1,000,000 people visited Colorado during 1931, spending approximately $94,000,000 new money while here. This was large factor in enabling Colorado hold its economic position well in first rank as compared with other States. Since two national parks and several national monuments are located within Colorado's borders and attendance at these parks during the year shows marked increase, we are convinced the parks were major factor in attracting enormous number of visitors and that continued improvement and operation of our national parks with adequate appropriations is of utmost economic importance to Colorado."

A copy of the study mentioned is inclosed herewith.

We hope you will lend your influence toward maintaining operation of Colorado's national parks on a high plane, for they seem to be the lodestone which attracts a large percentage of our paying visitors.

Cordially yours, DUDLEY R. GRIGGS, Secretary.

"WHAT VALUE IS THE TOURIST BUSINESS TO ME?"

To answer this oft-repeated question of the individual, the Colorado association has prepared this study to bring to light factors not commonly known. The information shown does not give a complete answer but provides a basis on which the individual may draw his own conclusions. Tables are included showing the following data:

Number of other States' automobiles visiting Colorado; number of people arriving by private automobile; number of people arriving by railroad train; total number of visitors in 1931; where they came from; how long they remained in Colorado; how much money they spent in Colorado; apparent quantities of Colorado-grown foods consumed; quantities of gasoline and oil used; travel reports—Rocky Mountain National Park and Mesa Verde National Park.

Wherever possible figures used in this report were taken from official or public records based upon actual counts. Where estimates and averages appear they have been calculated to show a minimum rather than a maximum result, and the method of arriving at totals is explained.

HOW THE TOURIST'S DOLLAR IS SPENT

The following estimates were made during the years 1923–1927:

	Estimated by—
	International Travel Federation	United States Chamber of Commerce	Southern California

Approximate number of people who visited Colorado from other States in 1931

	People by private automobiles	Estimated people by railroads	Total visitors
3 summer months, June, July, and August	588,150	202,000	790,000
9 other months, January–May and September–December	401,998	198,000	600,000
Total, year	[1] 990,148	[2] 400,000	1,390,000

[1] 323,578 other States' automobiles counted entering Colorado, with an average of 3.06 passengers per car.

[2] 27 main-line passenger trains, carrying a minimum of 100 coaches and sleeping cars, enter Colorado via 7 railroads every day in the year. It is estimated that these trains bring into Colorado a minimum daily average of 27 passengers per train during the 9 non-summer months, and 81 passengers per daily train during the heavy-travel summer months. This estimate does not take into account augmented summer schedules or extra cars and extra trains which are added every summer, but is based entirely upon minimum winter schedules.

Approximate stay and money spent in Colorado during 1931 by visitors from other States

	Visiting people	Average days' stay	June, July, and August	Total average expenditure	Total expenditure
3 summer months, June, July, and August	790,000	[1] 20	$4.58	$91.60	$72,396,000
9 other months, January–May, and September–December	600,000	[1] 8	4.58	36.64	21,994,000
Total year	1,390,640				94,390,000

[1] In 1930 the Colorado summer visitors' questionnaire shows their average daily expenditure was $5.58 and length of stay 2.95 weeks. In response to current opinion that national economic conditions prevented visitors spending as much money in 1831 as in former years, we have adopted lower factors in arriving at the above totals: By dropping the average daily expenditure from $5.58 to $4.58 (a reduction of 18 per cent applied to the entire year's travel), and dropping the average stay for the 9 nonsummer months from 3 weeks to only 8 days (a reduction of 62 per cent).

[1] Estimated; no counting done.

[2] Actually counted entering Denver; no state-wide count available.

[3] Total actually counted at 9 gateways.

Approximately 60 per cent of the whole year travel comes in the three summer months of June, July, and August. In 1930 it reached its highest peak on August 17. In 1931 the peak seems to have been reached somewhat earlier.

The above tabulation was made from the Colorado State Highway Department traffic census. In the summer of 1929 the highway department made an experimental check of traffic at points on Colorado's principal through highways to obtain engineering data. This was repeated in 1930, and continued at certain stations in the vicinity of Denver during the late months of 1930 and early months of 1931. A state-wide check was again made during the summer months of 1931 continuing through October. Each report shows the volume of traffic moving in two directions and divides the count between vehicles carrying Colorado licenses and other licenses. This tabulation of the foreign licenses passing certain gateway stations in a direction leading toward the interior of the State makes possible an accurate estimate of the number of other States' cars visiting Colorado. An illustration of the count, by gateways, appears in the following table:

NOTE.—Automobiles enter Denver via a number of other gateways but the count at such gateways was not included in this table because of the impossibility of eliminating duplicate count of cars making circle trips out of Denver. No doubt some duplication exists in the count at above stations but the number of cars omitted at the excluded entrances more than offsets any possible duplication. A heavy highway-construction program throughout the State of Colorado during the year 1931 necessitated many long detours which upset the normal count at a number of important stations, particularly those at Limon and Fitzsimons Hospital.

An 8-hour daily count was made at the above stations. The percentage of the 24-hour travel passing each station during the eight counting hours was determined by frequent 24-hour counts. Such percentages range from a minimum of 37 per cent to a maximum of 66 per cent, an average of about 50 per cent.

Since there are many highway entrances to Colorado, other than those shown above, for which no count is available, the number of cars included in the State count represents a minimum of the number of cars which actually visited the State.

STATES DISTRIBUTION OF FOREIGN LICENSED AUTOMOBILES ENTERING AND LEAVING DENVER, AUGUST 22 TO SEPTEMBER 1, 1930, INCLUSIVE

This count was made to determine average people per car and percentage travel, by States. It was carried on 10 hours each day at four stations: Federal Boulevard at Fifty-second Avenue, Riverside underpass, Fitzsimons Hospital, and Petersburg.

COLORADO VISITORS' QUESTIONNAIRE ANALYSIS, 1930

To obtain reasonably accurate data as to the average time and money spent in Colorado by visitors from other States, it was decided that the best place to get such information was directly from the visitors.

In the fall of 1930 letters were written to 6,000 people residing in other States who visited in Colorado during the summer of 1930. Names and addresses were obtained from the registers of 14 hotels, 6 automobile cottage camps, and the secretary of State supplied the names of a number of visitors who had taken guest automobile licenses while here.

Each person written was asked to answer questions as to the number of persons in his family or traveling party, their length of stay in Colorado, the approximate amount of money spent by them in Colorado for food, lodging, and all other purposes, the number of miles traveled in Colorado after their arrival here, whether they came by railroad or automobile, what they liked best about Colorado, etc.

One thousand one hundred and eighty-three replies were received on which every question had been answered. These covered the Colorado visits of 3,894 people and are included in the tabulation shown below. Many were here but 1 day while others stayed 2 to 6 weeks, and some 3 to 6 months. One man was here two days, drove clear across the State, said he spent $2.75 and complained about high prices. Another stayed 10 weeks and spent $3,500, explaining that he bought a string of polo ponies along for a season of play. In some cases one person drove the family car to Colorado while other members of the family came by train. Some praised the mountain roads and complained about our plains roads; others spoke well of the plains roads but were nervous in the mountains. Some criticized high hotel rates but many lauded the courteous management and service of hotels. All expressed admiration of our mountain scenery, temperate climate, and the hospitality of Colorado people. In other words they represented a cross section of the American people.

Calculations as to food consumed by Colorado's summer visitors are based upon the number of people visiting Colorado from other States by private automobiles during the months of June, July, and August, 1931. During that period 192,206 other States' automobiles entered Colorado and brought 588,150 people, whose average sojourn in Colorado was three weeks.

It is estimated that the above quantities of Colorado-grown foods if loaded on railroad freight cars of average custom load would make a freight train 10 miles long.

Visitors to various national parks

[From annual report National Park Service—Includes actual counts and estimated attendance for full years]

Rocky Mountain, Colo	255,874	265,663
Mesa Verde, Colo	16,656	18,003

Grand Canyon, Ariz	172,763	156,964
Yellowstone, Wyo	227,901	221,243
Yosemite, Calif	458,566	461,555

It is interesting to note that of the two national parks situated near large centers of population, Yosemite near San Francisco and Rocky Mountain near Denver, 94 per cent of the travel to Yosemite is from California and 52 per cent of the travel to Rocky Mountain is from Colorado.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the State of Colorado has something over 1,035,000 inhabitants according to the last census. The Colorado Business Men's Association estimated that there were during 1931 a total of 1,390,000 visitors to our State and that they spent $94,390,000 in the State during their visit. Approximately 20 per cent of all the tourists that come to our State visit one or both of our two national parks—the Rocky Mountain National Park and the Mesa Verde National Park—the home of the ancient cliff dwellers. My State is by actual geological survey the highest State in the Union. Colorado is the top of this Western Hemisphere. The highest crest of the main range of the Rocky Mountains extends north and south through the center of the State. There are in the entire United States, I understand, 64 mountain peaks over 14,000 feet high, and 1 of them is in Washington, 13 in California, and 50 of them in Colorado, and 45 of those are in my congressional district, the western half of the State. So I have the distinction of representing the highest district in the United States. Colorado is "the gateway to the West." "The Centennial State" is "out where the West begins." We are building up the splendid sentiment of "See America first." People from all parts of the world are visiting our two parks every year.

Our national parks are wonderful meeting places for people from every State. Every year people get acquainted with people from all parts of the country. These parks are rapidly developing a most friendly feeling of our people toward the people of all other States. They are a great aid to a united Americanization. This subcommittee, from personal knowledge in visiting these parks, very positive that the money we are appropriating toward upbuilding and developing and making these parks more attractive is the best expenditure our country is making anywhere. For that reason we have not reduced the expenditures for them very much. Every year our people are more and more flocking to these parks and having a cool, healthful, and invigorating summer outing.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the committee as to the reason why some of these parks require much larger apprcpriations for maintenance, and the like, than others? For instance, for the Yellowstone National Park there is recommended an appropriation of over $500,000 and for the Yosemite nearly $400,000, whereas for some of the other parks, like the Glacier National Park, the appropriation recommended is $224,000. What is the occasion for the varying amounts of appropriations for these respective parks?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. That depends upon the character, size, the attractive features, and importance of the park. Europeans who visit this country quite generally want to see the Grand Canyon of the Colorado River and the big trees of the Sequoia and General Grant Parks and the Yellowstone Park. The Yosemite Park has more visitors than any other. Many of the parks have on holidays and Sundays enormous crowds, and the park officials must preserve order and system and take care of many thousands of people. They must have suitable accommodations for all of them. Everything must be and is clean and attractive and at reasonable prices and convenient. That requires a large force during the peak of the summer season and a large amount of work and care between seasons.

Mr. STAFFORD. Some years back, but not recently, consideration was given to the policy of making a charge against all entrants to our national parks, especially those entering by automobiles. Is any such policy still in vogue, and how much revenue does the Government receive from that source and from the concessions? Also, what is the net cost to the Government for the maintenance of our park service?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman will refer to pages 773 and 774 of the hearings he will find a table of receipts and expenditures. We appropriate about $12,000,000 on all of the 22 parks and 34 monuments, and the receipts are about $1,000,000, as I recollect it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the policy still exist of making a charge against every entrant to a national park?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The National Park Service makes an entrance charge for each car. I do not remember the amount in each park. The rates are somewhat different, but the automobile tax is small.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking information as to whether the National Park Service is making a charge against every person entering a park by automobile.

Mr. FRENCH. There is an automobile tax as to every park, and in one or two of the parks we have a special charge. For instance, at Carlsbad we have unusual expenditures.

Mr. STAFFORD. What is the charge levied against all persons entering any of our national parks by automobile?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is against the automobile and not against the number of persons in each car.

Mr. STAFFORD. I know that in years back they levied a charge against even a Ford.

Mr. FRENCH. The charges vary with the different parks.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am seeking information. Is it a uniform charge applicable to all the parks, or does the charge vary?

Mr. FRENCH. There is not a uniform charge. The charge varies with the different parks.

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman will permit, is it not more like a road tax? There are a great many miles of roads in these parks and you enter with your car and then you are asked to pay something for the use of the roads.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And we are spending many millions of dollars in the construction and maintenance of a splendid and permanent system of scenic highways through the parks.

Mr. STAFFORD. It may be excused under that guise, but years ago there were not many miles of roads in the Yosemite, for instance, and yet they were levying this fee which you now claim to be a road tax. It was a charge made against every person who came in, and it was an admission charge to see the beauties of the park.

Mr. MURPHY. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the charge ranges from $1 to $2, and this gives permission to go in and out of the park during the entire park season. Coupled with this is the privilege of fishing inside of the park in any of the streams or lakes there. It also gives them the privilege of using the splendid camp grounds and all the facilities provided there for their comfort.

Mr. STAFFORD. Years back they imposed a material charge of $5 and $10, and I protested against it. I am pleased to learn that the National Park Service is not following their old policy of exacting high fees from the poorer people who use inexpensive cars to see national scenery and then charging it up to maintenance of roads.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment the gentleman from Colorado on the references he has just made to the uses made of the national parks. It has been my privilege to visit several of them. I think I visited seven of them on one trip; and if there is anything in the Government service that is well cared for, well attended to, and where good service is provided visitors, it is under the National Park Service.

It is a great opportunity for the American people to have a splendid vacation at a very moderate price and secure more than one dollar of value for every dollar they expend in one of these trips.

I want now to speak in reference to another matter. I notice that later on in the bill appropriations are made for the care of monuments, and there is also an appropriation for the care of the George Washington Birthplace National Monument.

I am in favor of this appropriation, Mr. Chairman, but I want to call attention to the fact that the greatest shrine of all, in connection with the memory of George Washington, is not national property. I think it is a shame that Mount Vernon is not under the control of the Federal Government. I appreciate the care that is given this great place by the women who own it; nevertheless and irrespective of that feature, it is a place that can be run for profit. The receipts from Mount Vernon are very large. We have just completed the most magnificent memorial boulevard in memory of George Washington that could have been built with money. Four and a half million dollars, I believe, has been spent on the road from the farther end of the new bridge to Mount Vernon, and you run into a turnstile where private people ask you to contribute 25 cents. If there is anything more this year that we could do in commemoration of the memory of George Washington on the two hundredth anniversary of his birth, it seems to me it is that we should inaugurate a movement by which this greatest American shrine shall become the property of the Federal Government.

I am not finding fault or criticising the management of Mount Vernon. Fortunately, it is excellent, and the women have great pride, of course, in going there once a year and having their meetings and continuing themselves in office.

All this may be good, but the fact that they own it and not the United States Government galls me for one.

For instance, last summer there was an American exhibit at the fair in Paris, and there was placed there a replica of the Washington House at Mount Vernon. You are copying for exhibition purposes a private house as an exhibit for the United States Government. This does not sound right to me.

I do not care how well the property is handled, the property should be owned by the Government, and while a bill which I have introduced once or twice has not received very much attention because this self-perpetuating organization of women is opposed to it, nevertheless it is a movement that for one I want to see followed up so that eventually Mount Vernon may become American property. [Applause.]

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

In 1857 the Mount Vernon property was in rack and ruin. It was overgrown with weeds and the house was in a deplorable condition. A little old southern lady, a cripple, conceived the idea of buying Mount Vernon through popular subscriptions, and she proceeded to do this many years ago, and through the years Mount Vernon has gradually come into its own.

Since that time the building has been put in excellent condition, personal property returned, so that now our beloved George Washington's home is almost in its original condition. These women are proud of what they have done, and if these women want to sell, well and good; but if they still want to keep possession of this inspiring property and handle it without profit, because although they do charge an entrance fee, all the money they take in is spent in taking care of the property year after year, transplanting trees, taking down the old ones that have become decayed, and planting new trees in their places, taking care of the boxwood, and every other conceivable thing that goes to make up this beautiful and wonderful property, I think they should be allowed to do so. This is a national shrine in every sense of the word, and the women's organization which cares for it is true to the great trust assumed by it.

These women are proud of their accomplishments, and justly so, and I say that if they want to sell it to the Federal Government, yes. But I hope the Federal Government will never take it upon itself to force these women to sell the property. They are looking after it and they are proud of it. I do not care, for one, to see it change hands if it is taken care of the way it is and has been taken care of these many years.

Mr. LOZIER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. I yield.

Mr. LOZIER. Is not it true that the Mount Vernon property was offered repeatedly to the Federal Government, but the Government was seemingly not interested and declined to buy? The probability is that if these ladies had not bought and improved this historic property and made it a national shrine it would now be in the hands of private owners who would mercilessly exploit it. I think it would be a calamity to take that property out of the hands of the organization of patriotic women who control and efficiently manage it. The plan sponsored by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] would subject it to political management and control, which should be avoided.

Mr. ARENTZ. Oh, I do not believe it would come under political management and control. Mount Vernon is a national shrine, and nearly everybody who comes to the National Capital visits it, and whether it is held in trust for all the people of America by the Federal Government or rests in its present hands, I have full faith that it will be well taken care of.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I hope for the committee that we may proceed with the consideration of the remainder of the bill and talk only about amendments germane to the bill. It is now past 4 o'clock, and the management of the House have advised that they want the bill completed this afternoon. I want to appeal to the membership of the committee to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yellowstone National Park, Wyo.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $6,175 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, not exceeding $8,400 for maintenance of the road in the national forest leading out of the park from the east boundary, not exceeding $7,500 for maintenance of the road in the national forest leading out of the park from the south boundary, and including feed for buffalo and other animals and salaries of buffalo keepers, $468,700; for construction of physical improvements $60,100, including not exceeding $39,800 for extension of water and sewer systems, and not exceeding $19,900 for the construction of buildings, of which not exceeding $3,000 shall be available for a bunk house, $6,000 for a ranger station, $10,000 for a heating system; in all, $528,800.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. At the top of the page I notice this language, "not exceeding $8,400 for the maintenance of the road in the national forest leading out of the park," and so forth.

As I understand it, this is outside of the park.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. This is in pursuance of the Leavitt bill for the expenditure of money on post roads, authorized by the last Congress.

Mr. DOWELL. This comes out of that fund?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; but it goes through a country that they could not get money enough for the purpose, because there is no taxable property there. The Leavitt bill authorized a reasonable amount of money to make the post roads available for use of the parks.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yosemite National Park, Calif.: For administration, protection, and maintenance, including not exceeding $1,800 for the maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the superintendent and employees in connection with general park work, not exceeding $3,200 for maintenance of that part of the Wawona Road in the Sierra National Forest between the park boundary 2 miles north of Wawona and the park boundary near the Mariposa Grove of Big Trees, not exceeding $2,000 for maintenance of the road in the Stanislaus National Forest connecting the Tioga Road with the Hetch Hetchy Road near Mather Station, and including necessary expenses of a comprehensive study of the problems relating to the use and enjoyment of the Yosemite National Park and the preservation of its natural features, $327,700; for construction of physical improvements, $71,500, including not exceeding $22,900 for the construction of buildings, of which not exceeding $5,000 shall be available for a comfort station, $5,500 for a dormitory, $2,100 for a storage shed, $1,700 for a refrigerating room, not exceeding $39,200 for extension and improvement of electric system; in all, $399,200.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring whether this is not another case where it is proposed to connect up roads in the national parks with roads outside the parks some distance away; that is, a strip of territory around the park which is either a national forest, where there is no taxable property from which to build a road? Is that the situation here?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; the Government has to build a road or they would not have any.

Mr. TILSON. It was such a road that I traveled over with the committee last summer, when I had the pleasure of being with the committee for a while; or, at least, that was the understanding I had at the time.

The Clerk read as follows:

National monuments: For administration, protection, maintenance, and preservation of national monuments, including not exceeding $2,900 for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and repair of motor-driven passenger-carrying vehicles for the use of the custodians and employees in connection with general monument work, $76,500; for construction of physicial improvements, $17,300, of which not exceeding $2,900 shall be available for an employee's quarters, $3,700 for two comfort stations, $3,500 for two tool sheds; in all, $93,800: Provided, That the unexpended balance of the appropriation for a water supply at Chaco Canyon for the fiscal year 1931 shall remain available until June 30, 1933.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I had not intended to address myself to the subject I have in mind, in view of the request of the chairman of the subcommittee that we be allowed to complete the bill this afternoon, but since the chairman himself returned to the Rocky Mountain National Park item and took five minutes time, I am going to presume to return to the Glacier National Park. I shall do so in a way that ties it closely with the immediate subject of national monuments. I have in mind speaking of an international monument provided for in a bill I have introduced for the purpose of combining the Glacier National Park in the State of Montana and the Waterton Lake National Park in the Provinces of Alberta and British Columbia, into what will be known as the Waterton-Glacier International Peace Park. The idea is to connect those two parks internationally as one great monument to the long-existing good will and peace between the Canadian and the American people. That bill has been introduced and is now in process of consideration in the State Department of the Canadian Government. Our Government feels we should first have the opinion of the Canadian Government before the bill is advanced through Congress. If this bill becomes a law, and I am sure it will, it will provide that the Glacier National Park shall be known for administrative purposes as the Glacier National Park section of the Waterton-Glacier International Peace Park. The people who visit those two parks will be continually impressed not only by the magnificence of the towering peaks, but by something imminent there that will call to their attention continually the fact that we have as two nations set before the world throughout a history of over a century an unbroken example of international good will. I am sure that when that bill reaches the floor it will be unanimously passed by this Congress, and that in turn it will have the approval of the Canadian Government. It is hoped that during this year at the time of the International Rotary meeting, which is to be held on the western coast, a dedication can take place joined in by many nations.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I shall take only a moment to express appreciation for the very fine work that this committee is doing. I regret, however, that they have established a policy that no new project shall be included in the Interior Department appropriation bill this year. It so happens that in my home county the Government has a national monument known as the Dinosaur National Monument. It is within 6 miles of a transcontinental highway, and promises to become one of the scenic wonders of the country. It has been visited during the last year by experts. One of those made this statement in a letter:

I have recited all these details in order to visualize the situation, as I am fully convinced that here is an opportunity to create one of the most spectacular attractions in the entire United States, ranking in drawing appeal with the Yellowstone Park and the Grand Canyon.

Scientific institutions have taken from this monument several very fine specimens of dinosaurs. The American Museum of Natural History in New York has become interested in the proposition, and has practically made to us an offer that if the Government would spend $25,000 in doing some preliminary excavation work, they would put experts at work there for three years. In doing this scientific work they would spend two dollars for every one that it would cost to do this preliminary work. We find ourselves in this position. Some of these fine specimens that are to be assembled there in what will probably be the first great outdoor museum of the world are covered over with loose rock and dirt. No one knows whether or not they are deteriorating and being injured, but the chances are that they are in that part where excavation work has been done. We have a proposition that the museum would spend probably two dollars for each one that it cost the Government, and yet in view of this hard-and-fast rule that nothing new shall be undertaken by the Interior Department this wonderful opportunity must be lost. We have seen to-day how useless it would be to offer an amendment. Scientific men have studied this proposition. The people of my State are appealing for it. It has merit. It meets with the requirements of the Park Service in every particular, and yet we can not offer an amendment, because we have seen to-day how useless it is. To offer an amendment is an idle gesture.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How much will it cost?

Mr. COLTON. About $25,000. It has been determined that no new project shall be authorized in the bill. I regret this very much, because I think this is being penny wise and pound foolish.

The Clerk read as follows:

Construction, etc., of roads and trails: For the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges, in national parks and monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, including the roads from Glacier Park Station through the Blackfeet Indian Reservation to various points in the boundary line of the Glacier National Park and the international boundary, and the Grand Canyon Highway from the National Old Trails Highway to the south boundary of the Grand Canyon National Park as authorized by the act approved June 5, 1924 (43 Stat. 423), and including that part of the Wawona Road in the Sierra National Forest between the Yosemite National Park boundary 2 miles north of Wawona and the park boundary near the Mariposa Grove of Big Trees, and that part of the Yakima Park Highway between the Mount Rainier National Park boundary and connecting with the Cayuse Pass State Highway, and for the replacement of an officers' quarters on the Navy mine depot in connection with the Colonial National Monument parkway, Virginia, at a cost of not to exceed $12,000, to be immediately available and remain available until expended, $5,000,000, which includes $2,850,000, the amount of the contractual authorization contained in the act making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year 1932, approved February 14, 1931 (46 Stat. 1155): Provided, That not to exceed $25,000 of the amount herein appropriated may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia during the fiscal year 1933: Provided further, That in addition to the amount herein appropriated the Secretary of the Interior may also approve projects, incur obligations, and enter into contracts for additional work not exceeding a total of $2,500,000, and his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the cost thereof and appropriations hereafter made for the construction of roads in national parks and monuments shall be considered available for the purpose of discharging the obligation so created: Provided further, That not to exceed $1,200,000 shall be available for national-park and national-monument approach roads, inclusive of necessary bridges.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order upon the provisos in lines 13 to 25, inclusive, on page 94, that they are legislation unauthorized by law. The second proviso provides that—

The Secretary of the Interior may also improve projects, incur obligations, and enter into contracts for additional work, etc., and that his action in so doing shall be deemed a contractual obligation of the Federal Government for the payment of the costs thereof and appropriations hereafter made for the construction of roads in national parks and monuments shall be considered available for the purpose of discharging the obligation so created.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rather think that it is subject to the point of order, although the last proviso in line 22, at the end of the page, I think, is not subject to the point of order.

Mr. GOSS. Any language in the paragraph referred to is subject to a point of order and would strike out the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. O'CONNOR). The Chair is ready to rule. The wording of the proviso is obviously legislation. In the opinion of the Chair the proviso is out of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Insert on page 94, line 13, after the colon, the following: "Provided, That not to exceed $1,200,000 shall be available for national park and national monument approach roads, inclusive of necessary bridges."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the language is legislation unauthorized by law in an appropriation bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is authorized by law. I yield to the gentleman from Montana to cite the law.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the point of order. Public Law No. 592, of the Seventy-first Congress increased the authorization for appropriations for national park roads in the sum of $2,500,000, with the special provision that for a period of two years $1,500,000 for each year might be expended for the construction of approach roads to the national parks.

This item is in accordance with public law No. 592 of the Seventy-first Congress, and is clearly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. Section 8, title 16, United States Code, provides by law enacted April 9, 1924, that the Secretary of the Interior, in his administration of the National Park Service, is authorized to construct, reconstruct, and improve roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges in the national parks and monuments, under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior.

There being authority in law for the appropriation, the point of order is overruled.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I think the word "further" should be in the amendment, so that it would read "Provided further." I ask unanimous consent that that be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, that we appropriate many, many millions of dollars for roads in the national parks and for other purposes. I always favored every reasonable appropriation for that purpose, but on investigation I find that these millions and millions of dollars that have been appropriated for roads and other purposes in the national parks have been appropriated not so much for the public as for private interests. I know that concessions have been granted in many of these parks to private bus operators, hotels, and others, and, as I understand, it is one organization, one corporation that controls the concessions in all or nearly all of the public parks. The rates charged by those people for transportation in the parks are unreasonable, unfair, and unjustifiable.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. Did I understand the gentleman to say that one company was understood to have all of these concessions?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, there are two or three separate companies.

Mr. LEAVITT. There are many different companies.

Mr. SABATH. But it is all controlled by one group. I know something about it.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. SABATH. I have visited these parks and I made an investigation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LEAVITT. Does the gentleman know that the price charged in the hotels and by the bus lines which have concessions in the national parks is fixed by the Government itself and not by the concessionnaire?

Mr. SABATH. If the Government fixes the price, I say that those individuals representing the Government who permitted these tremendously high rates to be charged are not interested in the welfare of this Government or the visitors to the parks. I am interested in the parks. I spend as much time in them as any man. I traveled through, and I know the rates that are charged, and I say that in many instances the charges in the hotels are criminal—they are outrageous. I stopped in nearly all of the hotels. I do not think there is a park where I have not stopped for a day or two days or three days. I could not stay longer because I could not afford it. Otherwise I would have remained much longer in some of the places.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did the gentleman ever stop in a hotel in the city of Chicago?

Mr. SABATH. In the city of Chicago, I am pleased to say, the gentleman can stop in a very respectable high-grade hotel, and he will not be obliged to pay more than $2, $2.50, or $3 a day. We have hundreds of hotels which will give accommodations for that price.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not true that in almost all our parks, if the gentleman wished, he could go to a lodge where he would get the very best accommodations with a total charge of $4.50 a day? Can the gentleman do better than that for lodging and his board at any reputable hotel in the city of Chicago?

Mr. SABATH. Oh, I know the camps in these parks. I have stopped at the camps most of the time, because I could not afford to stop at the hotels that charge from $12 to $20 a day for a decent room. That is a fact.

Mr. LEAVITT. Where is that?

Mr. SABATH. Well, we have it right in the Yosemite Valley, and we have it in all the other places.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman should be content with two minutes. We are trying to get through with this bill.

Mr. SABATH. I have not taken any time.

Mr. HASTINGS. That does not make any difference.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. I reserve the right to object. We are trying to get through with this bill this afternoon, and I think the gentleman should be content with two additional minutes.

Mr. SABATH. I want five minutes because there is something else I want to call to the attention of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I think it is far more important that the charges which have been made against the Park Service be answered than it is to have the bill concluded this afternoon. I think the statements which have been made against the Park Service are absolutely unwarranted.

Mr. HASTINGS. This bill has been before the committee for two or three weeks. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and if it is not concluded this afternoon, it will have to go over until Thursday, and those in charge of the business of the House have other things for that day.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is: Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. That will be all I wish to say against the Park Service. It seems to be very exasperating to some gentlemen, somehow or another, when any criticism is made against anything in their section of the country, in that section of the country which receives benefits all out of proportion to its revenues. I have before me a statement showing the amount of money our Government appropriates for the various States which these gentlemen, who rose, represent. I have here 10 different States which receive much larger benefits and appropriations than they pay to the Government of the United States. I am going to ask leave, as I do not wish to take the time of the committee, to insert appropriations received by them last year, and the amounts they have paid into the United States Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statements made by the gentleman, I think we should know what they are.

Mr. SABATH. Well, I will give them to you. For instance, take the State of Arizona, represented by the gentleman who made such a splendid plea for economy some time earlier in the afternoon. That State received $4,055,000 last year and paid into the Treasury only $2,265,000. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to put all of these figures in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think we should have them.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman insert——

Mr. SABATH. I will put all the States in, every one.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. I wish the gentleman would also put in his remarks the amount of public land in every State to which he is about to refer. Has the gentleman the figures giving that information?

Mr. SABATH. I do not have that information; no. That would be too much of a task for me to undertake. Mr. Chairman, I understand that I have the consent to put that information in the RECORD?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. I have objected twice unless the gentleman reads the figures and the States.

Mr. SABATH. I do not want to take up the time of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman could have done it in the time he has been trying to get unanimous consent.

Mr. SABATH. All right; I will get the time somehow and I will read them in if the gentleman insists, but I wanted to save time.

We have the State of Idaho, where the revenue was $723,000 and the appropriations $2,682,000.

Next, we have the State of Montana, with revenues of $1,793,000 and appropriations of $4,430,000.

Then, we have the State of Nevada, in which the revenue was $1,365,000 and the appropriation $1,800,000, and so on.

I have not the time to put in all the States, but I am willing to do it if I am permitted. I want to be fair with all the States, and I want you to have these figures. I have not compiled them. They are not my figures, but they have been compiled by an expert.

In conclusion, let me say that the gentleman from Nebraska was under the impression I had something against him when I pointed out the tremendous sums we have appropriated for the so-called land offices. I want the gentleman to investigate the income of the land office in his own State and find out the cost of that office. He will find that it costs the Government much more to run the office than it receives for all the lands it is able to dispose of in that State.

What I want to bring home is this. Every time the State that pays the greatest revenue to the Government comes in and asks for a little appropriation, immediately the men who are deriving all of the benefits object and oppose every honest effort for a decent appropriation; and yet these same men have demanded and demanded additional appropriations out of the Treasury. [Applause.]

Believing that I have the right, and that the country is entitled to know what States and what sections of our country are, on the one hand, contributing greatly to the Government, and, on the other hand, receiving small appropriations from it, I shall insert the list showing the amounts received from the States as compared with those distributed by the Government. It will show that 14 States—Arizona, Arkansas, Georgia, Idaho, Mississippi, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, Oregon, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, and Wyoming—received more in Federal aid than they paid to the Federal Government in income taxes and other internal revenue. You will notice that of this number, 10 are in the West.

REVENUE BY STATES

The total internal-revenue receipts from the 48 States and the amounts paid them in Federal aid during the fiscal year of 1931 are shown in the following table:

State	Total internal-revenue receipts	Amount of Federal aid

Illinois paid nearly twenty-three times as much toward the support of the Federal Government in internal revenue alone as it received from Washington in Federal aid. New York paid seventy-four, North Carolina, a Democratic State, more than fifty times as much.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, one of these days I propose to take a little time and make an analysis that will be adequate to meet the statement that has been made by the gentleman from Illinois, and similar statements, that have been made by several other gentlemen upon the floor of the House and in the press, touching the expenditures made in several of the small States of the West, including the State I represent in part in this Congress, where a contrast is made of the expenditures made in the State by the Government and the revenues derived by the Government from the State.

The lateness of the hour forbids more than a brief reply at this moment. The Federal Government is in the position of a great landed proprietor in Idaho and in several other States of the West. In Idaho approximately one-third of the area of the State is included within national forests from which the Federal Government as a proprietor is receiving revenue, and on account of which a very large part of the money to which the gentleman refers is appropriated, chargeable in the figures of the gentleman to the State of Idaho. The Federal Government is the proprietor of the lands and, therefore, as a proprietor must take care of its own property. Not only this, but in addition, the Federal Government owns more than one-third of the balance of the State. Necessarily, as a landed proprietor the Federal Government must make appropriations for Federal highways through its own lands for fire fighting and other services.

The very reason, basically, why many of the appropriations to which the gentleman has referred are made to the State I represent and to other States of the West is due to the fact that the Federal Government is the largest land proprietor within these domains.

Let me now turn to the other angle of the criticism. Many of the owners of mining properties in Idaho and in other States of the West, and many of the owners of other properties have their residences in States such as Illinois and New York. These gentlemen are receiving the profits from my State, and they are paying taxes in Chicago or in New York City. The credit for taxes that are received by the Treasury goes to the States to which the gentleman has referred as States furnishing greatest revenue to the Government, Illinois, New York, and other States of the East, while the investments oftentimes that return the profits are in Western States.

There would be precisely as much sense in saying that because the customs office in New York City receives vast sums on account of duties paid for goods shipped to her ports, though the goods be sent to all the States of the Union, New York would be entitled to all the credit because it is a port of entry. Briefly, these are the fallacies in the assertion that the gentleman has just made in his 10-minute speech. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this provision close in 20 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I had the privilege of listening to the eloquent speech of my friend from Arizona, and also a few moments ago, a speech by the chairman of the committee, in which he stated that he did not think the committee had gone far enough in paring down appropriations in this Interior Department bill. By a very fair ruling by the gentleman who occupies the chair, we have cut out $2,500,000 from the bill. Then the gentleman arises and offers an amendment, after the Chair sustained the point of order, and is now trying to insert $1,200,000 for the purpose of making available in the national parks national monuments and post roads, including a few bridges.

It does not seem to me to be necessary legislation, when we are going on a drive for rigid economy by the chairman of this particular committee.

I trust that the House will vote the amendment down. If the gentleman was sincere when he made the speech—and I do not doubt that he was—he should withdraw the amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman misunderstands; I said if this committee is subject to any criticism concerning the bill, which I do not at all admit, that it is because we have not reduced some of these appropriations more than we have.

Mr. GOSS. Well, the gentleman must have thought that it was subject to some criticism, or he would not have referred to it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There are only two items in this entire bill that I feel we may have reduced, possibly cut too much, and that is the matter of roads, in the national parks and roads through the Indian reservations, because roads are permanent improvements and they furnish very much-needed employment for many people.

Mr. GOSS. It also says national monuments.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. At the other end of the Capitol they just now are appropriating some $375,000,000 for the construction of roads to furnish work for thousands of hungry people.

Mr. GOSS. For roads, but the gentleman has included national monuments. If a road is a national monument, of course, that is one thing, but I assume that this is for monuments erected to the memory of some one.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, no. These national monuments are not monuments to people. There are 34 national monuments throughout our country that are practically in the nature of national parks.

Mr. GOSS. In the language of the bill, it is allowing the Secretary to approve projects, incurring obligations, entering into contracts for any kind of work.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. But the committee has stricken that out.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that there are some great men in the West entitled to have monuments erected to them for the tremendous sums of money they have secured from the National Government. [Laughter.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the amendment will be voted down because it is going to be the only opportunity we will have of reducing the sums in this appropriation bill and thereby saving the taxpayers this amount of money.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Does not the gentleman distinguish between a national monument and a national park? A national monument is like a national park; it is an area set aside for the same purpose.

Mr. GOSS. I suppose it could be so construed.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, I take this time to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH]. If there is one activity in this Government where the people of the United States get a 100-cent value for each dollar they spend, it is in the National Park Service.

The gentleman from Illinois complains of the outrageous charges in the parks. I am sure the gentleman can not find in the city of Chicago, in a first-class hotel, the accommodations of a room with bath, meals, and all the comforts afforded by such a hotel like that furnished in the Yellowstone National Park for $6.50 a day.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Has the gentleman been in any of the Yellowstone Park hotels lately? Can you get a room there and board for $6.50 a day? I have not been able to get that.

Mr. MURPHY. That is the rate, and you can get from that down. To show that the people of America do appreciate those parks, let me give you these figures. In 1919, 755,325 people visited the parks and national monuments of the country. In 1931, 3,152,845 people visited the national parks of the country. That tells the story better than any word that I might say as to what the people of America think of these parks.

The administration of the Park Service has been far above most of the activities that you can encounter in this Government. Our committee talk plainly to the gentlemen from the Interior Department. This department comes before our committee with their cards on the table face up. We do not do any blind cutting in our bill, but we consult the men who represent the activities of the department that we are working with, and we asked them frankly how little they can get along with. The National Park Service is being cut this year. We have taken everything from them that was left to be taken from them after the Budget got through. I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Gladly.

Mr. LUCE. As the remaining time has been preempted by other speakers, this is my only opportunity to ask permission to corroborate what the gentleman said with the heartiest amen of which I am capable.

Mr. MURPHY. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to join with my friend from Massachusetts in the statement he has just made. I went with this committee last summer for a few days and had been there two or three times before in visiting a number of the national parks.

So far as the matter of concessions is concerned, that is the best thing that I know of as a business proposition that the Government has gone into. I think the people who patronize these national parks get more for their money than in any other thing we do that the Government is connected with. Visitors are well taken care of, without expense to the taxpayers, whereas if the Government had to do what the concessionaires are doing we should have a large deficit every year. The concessions, as a rule, are so operated as to afford comfort, and luxury, if so desired, for such visitors as may require it. In fact, there are accommodations and prices in our national parks suitable to every pocketbook.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of not adopting the amendment offered by the chairman of the subcommittee would be simply to do nothing at all intended by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss]. You might say that I should not be speaking in behalf of this amendment, because the existing law would allow a million and a half dollars of any appropriation made for national-park roads to be used for these approach roads. The committee wants to reduce that to $1,200,000, and has therefore put in this limitation. It is an illustration that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] is addressing himself to this whole matter without definite information.

Mr. GOSS. Can the gentleman give us some other than what is in the bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman represents a State which is one of the oldest States in the Union, but which in area is about as large as a county in Montana.

Mr. GOSS. But how about the population?

Mr. LEAVITT. The population is something over half a million.

Mr. GOSS. Oh, very much more than that.

Mr. LEAVITT. I am speaking about Montana. That is not the point that I am getting at. I am getting at this thing from the standpoint that the gentleman from Connecticut, with good intentions, is doing untold damage, growing out of his failure to understand the situation. Let me illustrate what I say. The gentleman spoke about national monuments as if they were like the Washington Monument, a pile of stone. National monuments are such areas as the Grand Canyon, which was a national monument until a few years ago, when it was changed by law into a national park. There are other national parks that until a short period ago were national monuments. In other words, the gentleman was ignorant of what national monuments are, and so stated, when he spoke of them as something standing up in the air.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I can not yield further. The gentleman is striking at the interest of every citizen in the United States. The people of every State visit these national parks, and they are entitled to safe highways. As you go there with your family, as your constituents go into those areas of the national parks, they are entitled to have good roads on which they can drive with safety to the life of themselves and their families. When the gentleman says we can put off the construction of these roads, he is suggesting that we put off a measure of safety that is required for the utilization of these parks. The committee has already reduced the authorization for national-park-highway construction. I introduced in the last Congress a bill which became a law increasing to seven and a half million dollars the amount that could be expended within national parks for highways, with the provision that a million and a half of it could be used during the period of two years for approach roads to the national parks. The gentleman is now asking to strike out a limitation that the committee has put there to reduce the amount that could be spent this year to $1,200,000. If the gentleman's position is carried, the Park Service can expend $1,500,000, so that the gentleman is working in exactly the opposite direction from what he thinks he is working, and is defeating his own purpose.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield for a question, not for a speech.

Mr. GOSS. It reads, "National monument approach roads."

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; roads approaching national monuments.

Mr. GOSS. So that an approach road is considered as a national monument, is it not?

Mr. LEAVITT. It is not considered as a national monument; no, sir. It is a road approaching a national monument in order to make these great scenic points available to the American people under conditions that are safe for them to travel. That is all there is to this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that if we strike out this appropriation, the public service will have $1,500,000, which they could spend?

Mr. LEAVITT. They have $1,500,000 under a bill which I introduced in the last Congress, and this is a limitation cutting it down to $1,200,000. I should perhaps not say that, but I do that to show that the gentleman from Connecticut is again mistaken in what he is attempting to state.

Mr. STAFFORD. But that is an authorization and not an appropriation.

Mr. LEAVITT. The law stands that of the amount that is appropriated $1,500,000 can be expended for approach roads to the national parks and monuments, and if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado is not carried, they can spend $1,500,000. This is a limitation cutting it down to $1,200,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

My friend the gentleman from Chicago [Mr. SABATH] still has that cocklebur irritating him, because he failed to get $1,750,000 for the Chicago fair. We do not hold that against the gentleman at all. We love him because of his advocacy of his people; but I would suggest to the gentleman from Chicago that Chicago has grown to the city that it is to-day, and Chicago has prospered in all these years, because of the great Western States that the gentleman now wants to stifle and condemn. Our cattle, our grain, our hogs, our poultry—everything we produce has made Chicago great, and now the gentleman condemns and damns the people who feed him.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I refuse to yield. The gentleman's opposition to a little land office in my district is typical of his position on the floor of the House heretofore. The gentleman would close that service out there to our people; the gentleman would have the records and employees brought to Washington; the gentleman would take them out of a building that the Government owns where they are and bring them here in order that the salaries may be paid in the Capital City. I feel that the Government ought to serve its people where it can serve best, and that is out where the people are. Let me say about these parks, I spent some time in the parks this last summer, the great Yellowstone Park, with my family.

I did it for $2.50 per night, for clean beds and a fine place to stay. I did not require, because I could not afford it, the facilities of the fine hotel, any more than I can afford to go to the city of Chicago and stay with my family, because the hotels are altogether too high in price for me.

Mr. SABATH. Oh, no; the gentleman is wrong there. I can give the gentleman the names of 25 hotels where he can stop at $2 and $2.50 a day.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am told that possibly I could go to the gentleman's district and stay for less than I pay when I am in Chicago, but let us get back to the parks.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman can be my guest without any charge at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMMONS. In the parks you may sleep nights where the air is clear and clean, you may enjoy yourself in the daytime out where the sun shines and it is not smoky and cloudy, and there is no noise or soot.

Now, in all seriousness, the people use these parks. There are provisions for those who want to go there and have all the fine things they have in the modern city. There are provisions there also for people who can not afford to pay for those things. So I suggest to the gentleman that while there may be some of the things which the concessionaires do which I do not approve, these roads and trails will permit people to come out and see all of God's beauty untouched and unmarred by the hand of man, and they are made available to-day at the expense of the people of the United States, and we trust that we western Members will not be compelled to go back to our people and tell them that the city of Chicago, through its Congressman on the floor of the House, is fighting the things that help us to entertain you when you come out to see us. [Applause].

We want you to have nice roads. We do not want you to get stuck in the mud out in our country. We will furnish you with fine places to enjoy everything the West has to offer city men who want to get away from it all, if you will let us alone.

Mr. SABATH. I am for good roads; I am in love with the parks, and I am with you, but I am opposed to these concessions being given to people who will extract unjustifiably high fees.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman can establish that fact——

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman knows about some of the hotels. He has had his own experience with having them try to charge him big prices. I leave it to him whether they did not want to charge him from $12 to $20 a day in some of those hotels.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the gentleman I did not give them that opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. Goss) there were—ayes 56, noes 7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. (After counting.) One hundred and one Members are present, a quorum.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Howard University, $1,075,000.

Mr. DE PRIEST. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In the appropriation bill passed a year ago there was an authorization for a library to be constructed at the Howard University to cost $800,000. Four hundred thousand dollars was made available in the last appropriation bill, with an authorization of $400,000 to be appropriated this year. The Secretary of the Interior was authorized to sign contracts for the building. I am sorry to say that this year the appropriation bill only carries an additional appropriation of $100,000, making the total for the library building, for the building complete and equipped, $500,000. It also carried with it a recommendation for educational classrooms. This year that item has been eliminated absolutely.

The Budget estimate this year for Howard University was $1,610,000, but the appropriations for this university have been materially reduced. I am very sorry the committee could not see its way clear to appropriate enough money to complete the library as anticipated.

Howard University is under a 10-year program, and they contemplate an immense growth, it being the outstanding negro university of America. It is proposed to have it compete with the best schools of this country as a class A school.

I am not going to offer any amendment because I have been requested not to do so by certain friends of Howard University, but I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that this appropriation of $1,075,000 is almost $600,000 less than the Bureau of the Budget recommended.

I appreciate the fact that this country is in economic distress and that there is necessity for economy. However, it appears to me they have carried economy a long ways in connection with Howard University.

Take the heating plant at this university. It was estimated that $460,000 should be spent for heat, light, and power, but the committee has seen fit to reduce that amount to $300,000. With a 10-year building program at that university, I want to assure you, the opinion of the committee to the contrary notwithstanding, that the light, heat, and power plant erected at a cost of $300,000 will not carry the load when they get through with their building program. If it is necessary to economize, it might be advisable to cut out the library building and put up a heating plant that will eventually carry the load. It looks very foolish to me to construct a heating plant that will not eventually carry the load of the total building program. However, I presume the committee thought it necessary to make this great reduction, but Howard University has been reduced over 30 per cent. I am for good roads, and we appropriate $1,500,000 for good roads, but in addition to appropriating for good roads it is necessary to educate the minds of the youth of the land and properly prepare them if you are going to make good citizens of them.

As I said, I am not going to offer any amendment; but, I say, the committee has gone a long ways in economy by reducing the educational facilities at Howard University 30 per cent when it does not carry that same reduction along every other line.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DE PRIEST. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It does not look like very good economy to build a heating plant that will be inadequate to carry the load when the building program is completed.

Mr. DE PRIEST. I should not think so, and no business man would do that on a private proposition.

However, I am not going to offer an amendment because I know I could not have it adopted; but I am in hopes the Senate will restore the proper amount to complete the heating plant and library. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. Appropriations herein made for field work under the General Land Office, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the Bureau of Reclamation, the Geological Survey, and the National Park Service shall be available for the hire, with or without personal services, of work animals and animal-drawn and motor-propelled vehicles and equipment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the right to return to page 33 to offer an amendment, and I may as well offer it now.

I may say that upon further consultation with the committee we feel there is a small appropriation that ought to be put in at that point concerning an irrigation project in the State of Washington that has been recommended by the department and by the Budget, and I therefore offer the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: On page 33, after line 18, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"For completing construction of pumping plant and canals for the irrigation of higher lands on subdivision 2 Satus unit, Wapato project, Yakima Reservation, Wash., $15,000, to be reimbursed under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire whether this project is now in operation?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is merely a continuing appropriation to provide for an existing project?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes. The program during past years has drawn an appropriation of $258,000. Two units of the project are now served with water. This unit—the third—is not served adequately. Fifteen thousand dollars will complete the program, and we felt it was not fair, as we considered the whole proposition, to leave this investment without allowing enough more to make it usable to the people who are there.

Mr. STAFFORD. To what additional acreage will this proposal extend?

Mr. FRENCH. Fourteen thousand eight hundred acres are under subdivisions 1 and 2 and about 5,344 acres under subdivision 3, to which this applies.

Mr. STAFFORD. It means, then, we are opening up that much more acreage for cultivation?

Mr. FRENCH. In part, and in part we are furnishing supplemental water; but, as I said, when we were considering the several items in preparing the bill, we steered away from all new projects. Here we have an investment of $258,000, and this amount will make it a usable investment for these lands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: On page 106, at the end of line 16, strike out the period, insert a comma and the following:

"Provided, That no part of any money appropriated by this act shall be used for purchasing any motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle (except busses, station wagons, and ambulances) at a cost, delivered and completely equipped for operation, in excess of $750, including the value of a vehicle exchanged where exchange is involved; nor shall any money appropriated herein be used for maintaining, driving, or operating any Government-owned motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle not used exclusively for official purposes, and 'official purposes' shall not include the transportation of officers and employees between their domiciles and places of employment, except in cases of officers and employees engaged in field work, the character of whose work makes such transportation necessary, and then only when the same is approved by the head of the department. This section shall not apply to any motor vehicle for official use of the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I may say that this is the same amendment that was adopted in the agricultural bill, except that at the end we provide that it shall not apply to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not much broader than the amendment that was included in the agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The amendment in the agricultural bill would forbid any employee of the Agricultural Department from using a Government-owned automobile going from home to his work and back.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; this is somewhat liberalized. It was considered by the whole committee, and I was authorized and directed by the Appropriations Committee of the House to offer this amendment in this form at this time. Our intention is to put this amendment in all the appropriation bills and change in the Senate the Agricultural Committee amendment to conform to the language I now offer here. We feel that this provision is eminently appropriate and, in fact, absolutely necessary and right, and that it will save a very large amount of money. Congress has got to put some brakes upon this wholesale free automobile joy riding of Government employees in extravagantly expensive cars. All this talk about needing high-priced and large cars to travel over the mountains is all bunk. I live in the most mountainous district in the United States, and I have traveled over it in a Packard, a Cadillac, a Peerless, an Overland, a Dodge, and others, and those large, heavy cars just pound themselves all to pieces on mountain roads. The gas and upkeep is three times as much as a lighter car, and for the last four or five years I have used nothing but a Ford, and I have saved several thousand dollars by it, and no other car has ever gone any place I could not go.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I have three amendments at the desk. The first one is to strike out the figure "$750" and make it "$1,000," which I now offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5 of the amendment, strike out the figures "$750" and insert "$1,000."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is based on the advice of an expert in the Department of the Interior.

But what the gentlemen say they are driving at is economy, and the Secretary of Agriculture has said that it is economy not to buy the lowest-priced cars in some instances, but it is economy to buy, in some cases, about a 3,000-pound car, costing in the neighborhood of a thousand dollars.

Department officials declare the lowest-priced cars do not stand up under rough usage of the plains and the Rocky Mountain regions as well as heavier cars, and that their statistics per car-mile prove it.

The Secretary of Agriculture will be glad, I am informed, to accept the limitation of $1,000, and so will the Interior Department, I presume. When you put the $750 limit it is poor economy, because the cars will not stand the rough usage, and it will actually cost more money to repair and maintain them.

I cited an instance on the floor this afternoon of the fact that with a limitation of $750 you can not buy at Shoshone, Wyo., a car costing only $484 at the factory, because the freight for it will carry you beyond the $750 limitation. The freight is much more than 50 per cent of the cost of the car when delivered.

The gentleman who sponsored the amendment to the agricultural bill did not think that the freight would be added to the cost. I put that question up to Comptroller General McCarl, and he said that the freight is an ingredient of the cost and must be considered a part of it.

Now, what you are doing is to put the buck up to the Senate and give them the task of writing the amendment in proper language.

The Senate Appropriations Committee has found this a hopeless task, apparently, because they have killed the entire Collins automobile amendment, to which I objected in several speeches on the floor of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, in the first place it is not the intent of the Committee on Appropriations of the House to pass the buck to the House at the other end of the Capitol. I hope the time will never come when the House of Representatives is not willing and able to take responsibility for its own acts. [Applause]. In the second place, the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill carried the same limitation which this bill carries. I see no reason why there should be a difference between the Department of Interior bill and that for the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, can the gentleman tell us just how many makes of cars could be bought and delivered, for example, in Wyoming, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] has suggested for $750.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I can not of my own knowledge state how many cars would be permissible under the limitation.

Mr. MAPES. Is not that information that the Committee on Appropriations ought to have to give to the House before it comes in here with a limitation of this kind which will prevent the purchase of nearly all the cars in the United States?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I submit to the gentleman that the Committee on Appropriations has gone into the question carefully, that it knows what it is doing when it imposes a limitation of $750.

Mr. MAPES. That may be true, but it does not give the information to the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Moreover, permit me to state that I come from a mountainous State. I come from a State where the roads are not paved, where frequently roads are merely trails up the mountain side, and I travel in a Ford automobile, because I find it to be the most economical means of getting from one part of my State to the other.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Out in the West, where I come from, where roads are not paved, where we have torrential rains at certain seasons of the year, it frequently happens that streams ordinarily dry become converted into rushing torrents and that these red flats become nothing but pools of mud, and that a heavy car can not get through them. If one is driving a heavy car, one is invariably bogged down and mired, not for hours but sometimes for days, whereas on the other hand a little car, a Ford or a Chevrolet, can navigate almost anything that I have seen.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman says that he drives a Ford in his State. Can he tell the House how much a 5-passenger Ford, fully equipped, costs him in the State of Arizona, delivered?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. As I recall it, a 5-passenger Ford, properly equipped, will cost me $607 delivered at Phoenix, Ariz.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is a sedan?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; that is an open car.

Mr. MAPES. How much would a closed car cost the gentleman?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I do not know. I never travel in one; and if I do not travel in a closed car, I do not see any reason why anybody else should demand that he should be given a closed car.

Mr. MAPES. I presume the gentleman has something else besides a Ford.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I have absolutely nothing in addition to the Ford.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. It does not cost very much to drive a Ford from Texas to the gentleman's State, and you can buy the closed car in my State for around $600.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I am pleased to have the information.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. This limitation does not confine the Government to the purchase of the Ford car, or any one car. There are at least four cars of the type, and the price at which they can be purchased is within the amount fixed by this limitation.

Mr. SIMMONS. And the ordinary list price is not applicable to Government purchases, because these cars are bought by the Government always at less than the list price.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I am glad to get that information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I do this to make inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations as to the policy of forbidding the use of these Government-owned cars from the place of employment to the domicile of the worker. I stated when this item was submitted, when the Agriculture Department appropriation bill was under consideration, that it was the general practice in commercial houses to allow employees to use the company's cars going from the place of work to their homes.

This amendment will forbid any Government employees using a Government-owned car from his place of work to his home. It is counter to the generally established policy of commercial and industrial life. Why is it necessary to place that great imposition upon our Government employees, because if we require the automobile to be anchored or in a garage at the place of employment, they will require some means to go to and from work.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. At the suggestion of the chairman of the committee, I would make this statement in reply to the query: The amendment which is now offered is the amendment which the full committee favored and attached to the Departments of State and Justice, Commerce and Labor appropriation bill reported to the House yesterday. It was drawn by the capable clerk of the committee, after consultation with some of the department officials.

In the first place, it will be noted that we removed the limitation in so far as it applied to cars assigned to Cabinet officers. Then we further undertook to liberalize it by permitting employees who were engaged in investigational or field work, with the approval of the head of the department, to go from their homes to their work and back to their homes in a Government-owned car.

Mr. STAFFORD. I stated that this amendment was much more liberal in its provisions than the amendment that was incorporated in the agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The amendment to which the gentleman calls attention, in connection with the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, did forbid any employee driving from his home to his office in the District. This amendment still does, but if an employee in the District has investigational or other field work, then with the approval of the head of the department, even though he may be assigned to duty in the District, he might go in a Government-owned car to his work and return from such field work to his home.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am more concerned with the field service than with the service as far as the District is concerned.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Of course, this does not interfere in the slightest there, for it was liberalized to care for the field-service work, if approved by the head of the department.

Mr. STAFFORD. As the amendment was adopted as a part of the Agricultural Department appropriation act, all Government employees were banned from using the automobiles in going to or from work.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman's interpretation is entirely correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLANCY to the amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: In line 9 of the Taylor amendment, strike out the word "exclusively."

Mr. CLANCY. Members of the Appropriations Committee who are defending this amendment did not give me an opportunity to ask them any questions.

The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] talked about the price of his open car in Arizona, a warm climate. His was an open car. I quoted a specific instance where within a few weeks, at Shoshone, Wyo., a price was given on a closed Ford car at the factory of only $484, but the freight was $269, bringing the price of the car at Shoshone, Wyo., to $753, $3 above the dead line. He totally ignores that all-important case.

The price of a Chevrolet was $471, but the freight was $273, and it came just within $5 of this limitation. But in other regions the freight would be more and the Chevrolet would be barred, too.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLANCY. I must refuse to yield. The gentleman would not yield to me. He is a member of the committee and has unlimited time, whereas I have great difficulty in getting the floor for five minutes.

Now, with regard to my amendment to strike out the word "exclusively," I offered that amendment because of a statement made by the Director of the Geological Survey that the present language would prevent the use of the personal cars. He said there were four personal cars in one agency alone for cheap and occasional use. You would compel the purchase of a number of additional official cars, by forbidding the use of personal cars. If we would strike out the word "exclusively," the amendment would then prevent a great hardship and achieve economy.

Now, the gentleman from Arizona says they are not passing the buck to the Senate. They passed the buck to the Senate on the agricultural appropriation bill, and they concede now that they prevented the use of the car of the Secretary of Agriculture by that amendment. I was one who brought up that objection and the Comptroller General sustained me on it.

Moreover the Senate Appropriations Committee has absolutely killed a similar amendment to the House agricultural appropriation bill, which I objected to. Evidently the Senators thought the buck was passed to them. That seems to me to be a devastating answer to the buck passing.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has mentioned some arrangement as to the field force and in the confusion I could not understand him and I could not get him to yield to explain his remarks. I have great confidence in the fairness and ability of Judge OLIVER.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman wholly misunderstood me. I was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and the Chair stated that his time had expired. If I had been speaking in my own time I would have gladly answered any question the gentleman might have asked of me.

Mr. CLANCY. I am going to offer another amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I said nothing about any agreement, but the amendment provides that on such an occasion the employee using a Government-owned car must have the consent of the head of the department if he goes from his place of work to his home or from his home to his work when engaged in investigational or field work.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLANCY. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I want to ask the gentleman from Michigan if in his opinion the only type of vehicle a department may buy for delivery in Wyoming would be a motor cycle with a side car, or something like that, inasmuch as they are limited to $750 and the gentleman shows a price over that amount.

Mr. CLANCY. That is the way the law works out. Certainly a satisfactory auto can not be bought in some States.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken; and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CLANCY to the amendment offered by Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado: Beginning in line 10 of the Taylor amendment, strike out the language "shall not include the transportation of officials and employees between their domiciles and places of employment."

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the attitude of the House, I will frankly state that I am now making the record for the Senate. The language which I aimed to correct by my amendment is, roughly, that the use of an official car from the home or domicile of an employee to his office or work or from his office to his home is forbidden.

When I pointed out some days ago that the Collins amendment forbade a Cabinet member from going to the White House upon the call of the President, and when I pointed out that such an amendment would forbid the use of the President's car in going from the White House to his Rapidan summer camp, which is his summer home and office, and in returning from his summer home to the White House, which is his home and also his office, then the gentlemen accepted my suggestion and changed the language as it is changed in the Taylor amendment.

Now, what do you do by unwise and unfair amendments? You make a bootlegger out of that official user of the car. He will bootleg the car and the gasoline, because he will feel you should not cheat him with mean restrictions. He would not have to drive his car from his home to his work or back from his work to his home. He could leave the car next door and then he would defeat this language, and he could defeat it by leaving the car 100 yards from his work or office. That would be all right as long as he did not take the car to his home or office. Then what would happen? The car would be left out of doors in front of the house next to his home or out in the open in the fields in the case of a man working in the field service, instead of being placed in his own garage where the car would be protected from the elements. Thus, again, economy would be defeated.

Would the Government employee or official thus evade the law? The eighteenth amendment has taught him to evade unfair prohibitions. Some laws might be conceived of as being honored in the breach; and in an emergency to save lives or property in the field service why should not the official car be used from the home to the emergency or vice versa?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I have no desire to take from the gentleman from Michigan any pride of authorship, but I want to state to him that when this amendment was attached to the appropriation bill for the State, Justice, Labor, and Commerce Departments I had no knowledge of the speech he refers to. The amendment was written with the approval of the chairman of the committee and of the full committee. It was agreed to on yesterday but was really put in form some days prior thereto by the clerk of the committee. The amendment as drawn does not deny to any field employee the right to go from his home to his work and to return to his home provided the head of the department gives approval thereto, and it is so written in the amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I know the members of the committee are in a hurry to get home, but the statement just made here that Government officials occupying responsible positions in the Government service will deliberately violate the intent of this amendment, I do not believe ought to go unchallenged.

I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that I do not believe the Government employees will do that which he has suggested they will do and violate this law merely by getting around it in the way he has indicated. I think our Government officials are of a higher class than that. I have too great confidence in them to believe that statement is at all merited.

Mr. CLANCY. What is the purpose of the amendment if it is not to correct joy riding and improper use of public cars?

Mr. SIMMONS. The purpose of the amendment, if I understand it correctly, is this: Over a period of years there has grown up here in Washington, and elsewhere in the Government service, the habit of some of the Government employees having cars with chauffeurs come and get them and take them to work in the morning, and then they have the cars at 4.30 in the evening to take them home. The wives use the cars in the meantime. It is a custom that they felt they were privileged to carry on. It had its origin following the war, when there was a large number of Government cars owned by the War Department that the department wanted to get rid of.

They were turned over to these people, and, first, they were maintained, and now we are buying gasoline and furnishing chauffeurs and transportation of bureau chiefs, assistant bureau chiefs, head clerks, and what not in the Government service to and from their homes here in Washington and, to and from their homes in other cities. It is aimed to correct that situation, and I have confidence that when the Government officials affected by this amendment understand Congress wants this stopped, they will stop it, and they will not use any subterfuge to avoid what they know to be the intent of the Congress.

Mr. CLANCY. Does the gentleman know that in the debate on the agricultural bill it was said that they were using some of these official cars for taxicab purposes at night?

Mr. SIMMONS. That statement was made on the floor of the House by one gentleman, but there was no proof of that.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman mean that there is a prohibition in this amendment so that a Cabinet officer can not use his car to go from his home to his office?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is a specific exemption in the case of a Cabinet officer. The Cabinet officer is excepted from the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. What about Assistant Secretaries and Army officers?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think all those people can go to work in their own transportation, just as the gentleman and myself go to work in our own transportation.

Mr. CLANCY. The language of the amendment forbids them to use official cars for that purpose.

Mr. SNELL. What does the gentleman mean by "their own transportation"—the transportation which they provide for themselves?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Why should they not?

Mr. SNELL. I am not debating the question. I am just trying to get at the purpose of the amendment. I have noticed a lot of Government automobiles around here, and I have wondered what they were doing.

Mr. SIMMONS. This will stop this custom which has grown up over a number of years, and this is the only way to stop it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan to the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. No appropriation under the Department of the Interior available during the fiscal years 1932 and/or 1933 shall be used after the date of the approval of this act (1) to increase the compensation of any position within the grade to which such position has been allocated under the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, (2) to increase the compensation of any position in the field service the pay of which is adjustable to correspond so far as may be practicable to the rates established by such act as amended for the departmental service in the District of Columbia, (3) to increase the compensation of any position under such act through reallocation, (4) to increase the compensation of any person in any grade under such act through advancement to another position in the same grade or to a position in a higher grade at a rate in excess of the minimum rate of such higher grade unless such minimum rate would require an actual reduction in compensation, or (5) to increase the compensation of any other position of the Federal Government under such department. The appropriations or portions of appropriations unexpended by the operation of this section shall not be used for any other purposes, but shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury, and a report of the amounts so impounded for the period between the date of the approval of this act and October 31, 1932, shall be submitted to Congress on the first day of the next regular session.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LAGUARDIA: On page 106, line 17, strike out all of Section 3.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, this is not the first, and I am sure it is not the last, hopeless fight that I am waging on the floor of this House. This section should be stricken from the bill.

The provision is wrong, and all the rules that this House can adopt will not make it right. The section is before us by virtue of a rule adopted by the House which makes it germane.

I can only repeat the protest that I made on the previous bill, and which I shall continue to make and on which I am sure some day the House will be compelled to reverse itself and abandon this unjustifiable policy. We owe a solemn obligation to the employees of the Government, and promotion is just as much a part of their contract as the salary itself.

When we come to the post office appropriation bill, I do not know what the committee will do, but, surely, in that instance, where the law provides for automatic increases, it will be impossible to attach such an amendment. When we come to the Army and the Navy and other departments having automatic increases, I am very much interested to see what the Committee on Appropriations will do. The section stopping all promotions and all increases of pay now provided by law should not be placed in this bill or any other appropriation bill.

Now, gentlemen, all talk of salary reduction is absolutely at an end in this House. I would like to hear any gentleman sponsor salary reduction after the inflation currency bill which passed the House yesterday with an overwhelming majority. I dare anyone in or out of Congress to advocate reduction of pay of the wage earners, either in or out of the Government service, after the inflation bill which passed the House yesterday becomes a law.

I repeat, all the economy suggested seems to be to take it out of the pay of underpaid Government employees. All the adjustment suggested for the present economic crisis seems to be to reduce the wages of workers and office employees. All the relief considered by Congress and passed to date is to help the big bankers and the bond promoters. Millions for the millionaires but not even a pound of wheat for the hungry.

The railroad workers who were cajoled into accepting a pay cut should call for an immediate conference to reinstate their pay. They accepted a reduction under a misrepresentation, without knowledge that by a fiat of legislation, we would inflate the currency of this country and thereby reduce the purchasing power of the dollar of their reduced pay.

The same thing applies now to these automatic promotions which employees are entitled to. If the bill we passed yesterday has any effect at all, if it serves any purpose, it is to raise commodity prices.

If commodity prices are raised, you will have to raise salaries to a corresponding degree, as we had to do immediately after the war.

I shall continue to protest against this amendment. The amendment is uncalled for, it is demoralizing to the morale, it impairs the efficiency of Government business. I am not going to be discouraged in taking a stand on a proposition like this. I am not going to be frightened out of it by sneers; I shall continue to fight as long as I know that something is wrong. This is morally wrong and unnecessary. If we do not do something at this session, we will do it at the next session. If the inflation bill works, as some bankers hope it is going to work, we will have to increase salaries of Government employees. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'CONNOR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8397, the Interior Department appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CONSOLIDATION OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing much talk on the question of economy; the cutting down of appropriations; the saving of money through the consolidation of executive departments. The House Appropriations Committee is doing splendid work in carrying out this well-formulated Democratic program and the House is giving support. This afternoon we heard a very statesmanlike speech delivered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS]. He spoke on the subject of extravagance in governmental expenditures and his words were the language of a patriot. It was a courageous speech and is deserving of the careful study of the Members of the House. Mr. Speaker, I see present here the chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I know that that committee has been working on a program along the lines touched on by the gentleman from Arizona. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] kindly tell us what his committee is doing and what he expects to report?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments as now constituted was organized only two months ago, but I may say to the gentleman from Georgia that the committee is functioning and will continue to function as long as I am chairman of it. For 30 years we have been trying to get a bill on the floor of this House to consolidate the Army and the Navy. That bill is closer to the door of the House now than it has ever before been. [Applause.] I expect that on Thursday the committee will close the hearings upon that bill and I hope it will. On the Saturday following I propose to call an executive session of the committee for the purpose of passing upon it, and I hope the bill will be reported and that it will come on the floor of the House so that the House may once for all determine whether it wants to consolidate those two agencies and save millions of dollars. Further, immediately after that bill is disposed of by the committee, there will be a hearing on a bill to create a department of public works, and following that there will be a hearing on a bill to consolidate all of the personnel activities of the Government under one administrator. We have other bills in course of preparation.

Mr. Speaker, we have had two members of the President's Cabinet to appear before our committee, and I have letters from every member of the Cabinet in answer to communications requesting expressions concerning their attitude on bills that the committee has under consideration, and not one member of the President's family indorses the bills which the committee will probably recommend be enacted into law. There is one gentleman in the Federal service so far who has written our committee in reference to these consolidation bills who has taken the proper attitude, and that is Governor Campbell, of the Civil Service Commission. He sent in a report in response to my request and shows the committee where the consolidation of certain activities would save at least over a million dollars the first year. If we could get that same cooperation from the members of the President's Cabinet, if they would help us consolidate the various activities, and destroy these useless bureaus, there would be no necessity for holding hearings, but we could go ahead and accomplish something. Further, if the attitude of the heads of the various Government agencies continue as they are now, it is my purpose to move in the committee that we cease to hear them and proceed and report legislation to the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the committee of the gentleman from Missouri has jurisdiction of the matter, and if the gentleman from Missouri is working on the consolidation of these bureaus, what is the necessity for a special committee from the Committee on Appropriations to go into the same subject matter?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I know nothing about that, but I know that our committee is functioning, and will continue to function as long as I am chairman, and when I can not make it function, I shall resign as chairman.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT ON CERTAIN BILLS

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed supplemental reports from the Committee on Claims on the bills H. R. 4938 and H. R. 6154.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HERBERT HOOVER

Mr. FREE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. FREE. Mr. Speaker, Herbert Hoover was born in West Branch, Iowa, August 10, 1874. His father was Jesse Clark Hoover, and his mother was Hulda Randall Minthorn Hoover. They were part of a Quaker colony which had migrated to this productive section of Iowa. His father, though a graduate of a Quaker college—and may I say that most of the members of this colony were college graduates—established himself as the blacksmith of the village. He was known generally through the colony as a genius with tools and his work consisted in doing many things which were not ordinarily done by the average blacksmith. His mother was a woman of fine personality, shy and reserved, and yet prominently identified with the Quaker colony as one of its preachers.

When Herbert was but 6 years of age his father died, leaving his mother a widow with three children—Theodore, Herbert, and a daughter, Mary. Outside of a comfortable home there was not much left in the estate of Jesse Hoover from which to support this widow and her family, and yet she went bravely about her task, and by sewing for the neighbors was able to keep her little family together and to feed and clothe them and to send them to school. She also found time to go among the various Quaker settlements as a sort of preacher for her sect, and during those visits was compensated in a small way to make up for the loss of time which her visits necessitated when she otherwise would have been engaged in earning a livelihood for her children with her needle. When Herbert was but 10 years of age his mother was stricken with typhoid fever and died, leaving Herbert, his brother, and sister orphans. The children were taken by various relatives to be reared.

Herbert was sent to his uncle, Laban Miles, who was United States Government Indian agent for the Osage Tribe in Indian Territory, his uncle having chosen to devote his life to work among the Indians. After about eight months Herbert returned and made his home with his uncle and aunt, Allan and Millie Hoover, on an Iowa farm. He was given an opportunity to attend the district school, but out of school hours he utilized his time milking cows and doing the other usual chores which boys in those days had to do about a farm. This went on for some two years when it was finally decided, after consultation among his relatives, that for his better education he should be sent to join his uncle, John Minthorn, who was a country doctor and the president of the Pacific Academy, of Newburg, Oreg. Here he remained for about two years, attended school, and out of school hours he fed and curried the doctor's horses, milked the cows, helped with the furnace, and did other chores.

He then went to live with his grandfather, Miles, on a farm not far from the academy, and the number of chores increased. In fact, from what I have learned, life became real and earnest, between working on the farm and endeavoring to attend to his studies.

When he was 14 his uncle, Dr. John Minthorn, took up land development with the Oregon Land Co., which had offices in Salem and Portland, Oreg., and Herbert, bored by the ordinary routine of the academy, decided to join his uncle at Salem as his office boy. From that time on he made his own way in the world, slept in a room at the rear of the real-estate office, ate his meals wherever they could be secured at a reasonable cost, and at night devoted himself to further study. While engaged in this capacity he came in touch with a mining engineer who had told him something of the opportunities in the mining field. He, therefore, decided to make this his life work and without much direction proceeded to prepare himself for entrance into some university where he could get the necessary scientific training. From Salem, he went to Portland, got a job in a real-estate office as a useful boy of all work, worked by day and studied at night.

The great Leland Stanford Junior University, was to be opened in the fall of 1891. The university sent various professors throughout the Northwest to conduct examinations for entrance. Herbert decided to take them. Prof. Joseph Swain, a Quaker, and afterwards President of Swarthmore College, conducted these examinations at Portland. Herbert failed in several, but his earnestness and his latent ability appealed to this good man, and he suggested that if Herbert would study hard and come down to the university some weeks in advance of the opening and undergo some coaching he might be able to pass the entrance examinations.

So, in June, 1891, he journeyed on to Stanford with his small savings, which amounted to about $300. He spent the time between then and the opening of the university in being tutored, took the examinations and passed in everything except English composition, but was permitted to enter the university, provided this should be made up at some future time. Realizing that his $300 would soon be gone, and that he must earn money as he went along, he took a position as temporary clerk to the registrar. He took the agency for the San Francisco newspapers on the campus, as well as one for a laundry. He later became part-time secretary to Dr. John Branner, head of the department of geology.

During the vacation, after his freshman year, he assisted Doctor Branner, who had retained his post as State geologist of Arkansas, in preparing a survey and topographical map of Arkansas. He returned to Stanford in the fall as hard as nails and as brown as a berry with $200 additional in his pocket. During the following school year he kept on with the various jobs which provided him with funds upon which to live.

In the summer of 1893, between his sophomore and junior years, he secured a position with the United States Geological Survey and found himself under a great master of geology, Waldemar Lindgren. He spent the summer in the Sierra-Nevada Mountains, and again returned for his work at the university in the fall with his finances somewhat enhanced, and continued, as before, earning his own way.

The following summer he was again requested by Waldemar Lindgren to join him in making a survey of the interesting Pyramid Peak quadrangle near Lake Tahoe, Calif., and thus spent the entire summer in the out-of-doors, journeying by horseback, eating at a camp fire, and living under the stars, engaging in work from triangulation to topographical and geologic mapping. Lindgren, appreciating Hoover's work, had the name of Herbert Hoover printed on the maps with his own when the work was completed. He again returned to the university in the fall, this time with $300 toward his expenses for the coming year, and in rugged health.

During the following school year he took up the agency for some evening lectures and a series of concerts. By this time he had interested other students as assistants in his various business ventures, and so now had more headwork than footwork in carrying on these duties.

Stanford was a new university and had to lay out its plans for student organizations. At first they ran at rather loose ends, but Hoover conceived the idea that all the student activities should be organized under the direction of the student body, and that the various athletic and musical activities, together with the publication of the college paper, should be handled by this organization. He laid out a plan, but the students made as a condition to putting the plan into effect that he should become the treasurer of the student body, which position he accepted, although declining to take any salary for his work despite the insistence of his college mates that he do so. This was the first demonstration of his organizing ability.

He finally graduated from the university in May, 1895, in what is known as the Pioneer Class. Being without funds, he immediately looked for work. Mining in those days did not have the scientific backing that it later acquired, and a young engineer was looked upon as impractical and not of much value. As he himself has said, "because I had to eat," he took a laborer's job in the drifts of the Mayflower, a mine located near Grass Valley, Calif. He pounded a drill, shoveled ore, pushed a hand car for eight hours a day or night. In fact, he did all of the things that a miner was expected to do—all for $2.50 a day. He was finally promoted to night-shift boss, or gang foreman.

In those days the name of Louis Janin stood out among the greatest of mining engineers, and Hoover decided to take his small earnings which he had been able to save from this $2.50-a-day job and go to San Francisco and endeavor to become associated with this engineer, whose name was magic in the mining world. For a few weeks he served in Janin's office typing letters, keeping the correspondence, and so forth. Finally, one day Janin turned over to him the data in a mining suit and said, "I want a technical report on this situation." Hoover worked night and day on the job and presented a report which, in the words of Janin, "almost swept him off his feet." The practical knowledge which he had gained by using a pick and shovel, combined with his technical training and natural foresight, had given him an understanding of the subject far beyond what Janin had expected of so young an engineer. Hoover received the munificent salary of $50 a month while working in the office and $150 a month while out on the job as subordinate to the senior members of the staff. Janin finally sent Hoover on mining expeditions throughout California, Nevada, Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona, and incidentally raised his salary to $250 a month.

Gold had been discovered in the deserts of western Australia. Janin had been requested to recommend some California engineer to go out into that country and develop some properties for a firm that was beginning operations in that part of the world. Janin recommended Hoover, who at that time was but 23 years of age. Hoover accepted, went out to the properties, and spent two years under most trying situations, traveling about on a camel, living under the sweltering sun of the desert, where water was very scarce and had to be counted out in cupfuls, and where he was taxed to the limit of his ability. He developed for his company several mines, the outstanding one being known as the Sons of Gwalia. His work in Australia had attracted a great deal of attention because of his ability in determining metallurgical methods, designing equipment, and planning means of development for 10 large mines.

China was undergoing a reawakening, and he was offered the position as director of mines. He left Australia, returned to the United States, married his college sweetheart, Lou Henry, of Monterey, Calif. (this was in 1899, when he was but 25 years of age), and then went on to China, taking his bride with him. He surveyed the Chinese mines and endeavored to establish a real mining policy for that country, but much of his work was undone by the Boxer rebellion. During this rebellion he took an active part defending Americans at Tientsin, where he and his wife resided.

He was finally made general manager of the Chinese Engineering & Mining Co. and devoted his time to developing coal properties, building railroads, handling a fleet of ocean-going steamers, developing cement works, in all of which activities he superintended about 20,000,000 employees. He built the Chinwangtao Harbor as an outlet for the coal of these mines.

In 1902, at the age of 28, he was given a junior partnership in an outstanding firm of mining engineers, and from that time maintained offices in San Francisco, New York, and London. As a member of this firm he had an opportunity to demonstrate his outstanding integrity. A subordinate connected with the firm had lost in speculation over a million dollars. While the firm was not legally responsible, yet Hoover felt that it was morally responsible for this money. So he insisted that the money be made good, and in making up this loss it nearly brought about his financial ruin. In 1908 he withdrew from the firm and went into business for himself, being then 34 years of age. At this time he was probably the leading consulting mining engineer in the world.

From then on he became interested in gigantic developments. He became distinctly a coordinator and executive, an administrator of industrial enterprises, an eliminator of waste and folly. One of his closest associates has said of him:

> He was, toward the end, a great doctor of sick companies. When a concern which ought to produce or pay did not produce or pay, after everyone else gave it up, they called in Hoover. He diagnosed the trouble and cured it.

He maintained offices in San Francisco, New York, London, Melbourne, Shanghai, St. Petersburg, and Mandalay. He operated in South Australia, Russia, United States, Mexico, Korea, the Malay Straits Settlement, South Africa, and India. By 1914 he and his associates employed 175,000 men. His fairness in dealing with his employees is demonstrated by the fact that he never experienced a labor strike in any of his operations.

With all his other work he found time to prepare many treatises on mining, one of which, Principles of Mining, appeared in 1909. This treatise is still standard in technical schools. He and his good wife also found time to translate that technical work of the Middle Ages, De Re Metalica.

Hoover had spent the winter of 1913–14 at engineering work in the United States. San Francisco was preparing for the Panama-Pacific Exposition of 1915, and the directors appointed Mr. Hoover their commissioner to arrange for the participation of European Governments. He sailed in March, journeyed on his mission from capital to capital, and was in Europe when the war broke out. The war caught in its meshes 200,000 American tourists. Their letters of credit, traveling checks, and so forth, were worthless, as a moratorium of all banks had been declared throughout Europe, and they had no way to get out of Europe and from under the feet of the armies. Ambassador Page urged Mr. Hoover to take over the task of getting these people back to the United States. Mr. Hoover, therefore, with 10 other friends, put up the funds and arranged for the homeward journey of these tourists. Some $1,500,000 was advanced in this work, all of which was returned except $400.

The relief of Belgium then became a great problem. Maintained as a German territory, within a ring of bayonets and an electrified wire fence, it was not a self-supporting country, but largely a manufacturing one, and had to import 80 per cent of the produce it consumed. Mr. Hoover was again urged to take on the matter of the relief of Belgium. It is impossible in a few words to describe this gigantic operation, its difficulties, and its dangers. The distribution of funds for the support of 7,000,000 people throughout war-ridden Belgium, the securing of the funds, negotiating with various governments for the passage of relief ships is a whole story in itself; but, added to this, he was requested to take on the relief of the French, who had been cut off by the fighting armies. This he undertook, and he fed not only the Belgians but the French. For this last work the French Government alone handed over one check of 25,000,000 francs, or $5,000,000, payable to the order of Mr. Hoover personally, to be used as he saw fit. When the books were closed on these two undertakings they showed that over $928,000,000 was handled by his organization. Farsighted as he is, at the beginning he employed outstanding auditors to handle the money and to keep the books, so that not a dollar of these funds could go astray. These auditors at one time submitted a report to the French Government. They waived it aside with these words:

> We have tasks more pressing and fruitful than questioning the integrity of Mr. Hoover.

Let me say, in passing, that during all of this time he refused to take a single cent for either salary or expenses; and, despite the fact that with his engineering ability during the war he might have become the richest man in the world, through the opening up and the operation of mines which supplied war material, he waived this aside and impoverished his own fortune for the relief of others.

Even after we entered the war this work continued. His organization gathered the funds, provided the supplies, and transported them to the German lines, where they were then taken over by representatives of Holland and Spain, neutrals during the war.

Mr. Hoover's next great undertaking was that of Food Administrator under the administration of President Wilson. His plan was different from that of any other such officer in any country of the world. He worked through cooperation of our people and not through force. Fourteen million families in the United States signed pledges to cooperate with him in this work, and this meant real sacrifice. I can give no extensive description of this most interesting work, which engaged him until June, 1919, but must simply say in passing that he so reduced consumption through the cooperation of our people and so increased production that our food exports increased from 6,000,000 tons annually, pre-war, to 20,000,000 tons annually, thus providing the margin which held the Allies in the war and supplied our own soldiers abroad. This organization handled food purchases to the value of $9,000,000 without even a solitary whisper of any scandal.

During this period he was fighting the battle of the American farmer. The allied governments had united in their purchasing and were paying their farmers $1.50 a bushel for wheat. Hoover contended that this was not enough and through his persistent endeavor, forced the Allies to increase that price. The price was finally fixed at $2.20 a bushel by a special board, of 11 members, composed of 2 labor leaders, 6 executives of the farm assoeiations, 2 economists, and 1 business man appointed by President Wilson.

His work at this time also included membership in the War Council, the Export Council, the Grain Corporation, the Sugar Equalization Board, and the Belgian and French relief.

Most of us thought our war duties were ended when the armistice was signed. Not so with Mr. Hoover. He saw another great problem before him. A survey showed that Germany was starving; that Austria-Hungary was even in a worse plight. Poland and those other Provinces of old Russia, which Germany had overrun, were worse off than the Germans themselves, and all other parts of southeastern Europe were hungry and disorganized. Winter was on, and there could be no help from native planting until the summer; even then no great relief could be afforded, for seed was lacking and transportation disorganized. Through his efforts blockades were withdrawn, despite persistent objection of our allies. Food was sent to starving millions. Poland, Germany, Austria, Yugoslavia, Rumania, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, Lithuania, Latvia, and Armenia shared supplies exceeding in value $600,000,000.

He also battled with our allied governments to continue, at least for a time, to take the farm products for which they had contracted, in order to avoid economic catastrophe. If all of these products which had been accumulated had been thrown suddenly back on the market, it would have meant the ruination of the great farming population in the United States. This he averted by transferring these supplies into channels of relief for these starving countries and by persuading some of our allies to carry out their contracts for purchases of these products.

It is probably in these negotiations that he showed his greatest ability as a diplomat.

The handling of these supplies brought on another great job, that of the restoration of open ports and canals, the reestablishing of communications and railway services between various countries between which bitterness still existed, directing of coal production and distribution, in order that economic life and stability might be restored.

One of his greatest works during this period was the feeding, clothing, and giving of medical care through American charity to 10,000,000 undernourished children. This was carried on until July, 1922, during which time he raised over $80,000,000 for this particular work. He also organized a campaign against the typhus epidemic which was raging in eastern Europe, and reduced it from 600,000 to 10,000 cases in six months.

His viewpoint in regard to feeding the starving of countries against which we had just fought is expressed in a letter which has just come to light, in which he said:

> Because we do not kick a man in the stomach after we have licked him. From the point of view of an economist, * * * unless the German people can have food, can maintain order and a stable government, there is no hope of their paying the damages they owe the world * * *. We have not been fighting women and chfldren, and we are not beginning now * * *. No matter how deeply we may feel at the present moment, our vision must stretch over the next hundred years and we must write now into history such acts as will stand creditably in the minds of our grandchildren.

There is no question but that his relief of these starving peoples stabilized their governments and prevented the spread of bolshevism throughout all of Europe. Most of this work he directed as chairman of the Supreme Economic Council, which was created upon his recommendation, and a good part of it was done through the assistance of the Quakers, from which stock he originated, and through a congressional appropriation of $100,000,000.

When diplomats failed in negotiations for transportation of these supplies, the signature of Herbert Hoover was sufficient to open up the barriers during this period. His name was magic in the stricken countries.

On March 4, 1921, he was selected by President Harding as Secretary of Commerce, which at that time comprised six bureaus, as follows: Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Fisheries, Census, Standards, Coast and Geodetic Survey, Navigation, together with the Lighthouse Service and the Steamboat Inspection Service.

Since his appointment the department has taken over the Bureau of Mines, the Bureau of Patents, the All-American High Commission, and the Division of Radio. A volume might be written on his work with any one of those various bureaus, all of which have been increased in efficiency under his direction.

The Census Bureau has become a bureau not only to count individuals but to compile statistics for practical use, and which are a guidance to business men, farmers, manufacturers, and laborers. To-day it is the greatest fact-finding institution in the world.

The Bureau of Fisheries has likewise greatly expanded, and to-day it is an outstanding bureau in the study of scientific problems in relation to fish, their propagation and preservation. Under Mr. Hoover's direction laws have been passed for the conservation of the great salmon fisheries of Alaska, which otherwise would probably have been exterminated, and new methods have been discovered for assuring a supply of other kinds of fish for our people.

In the Bureau of Mines he has encouraged increased safety in underground workings and has decreased through these devices the number of underground-mining accidents.

The greatest service rendered by Mr. Hoover through these various bureaus is probably in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. He realized that in goods requiring much labor we can not compete with Europe, but that we can compete in high-quality products manufactured by our mass methods. With this thought in mind he convened over 200 leading manufacturers and laid out a definite plan. He set up some forty commodity divisions dedicated to studies in definite trades, such as steel, automobiles, foodstuffs, canned goods, textiles, and so forth.

These divisions reach out through commercial attachés and trade commissioners and special trade committees throughout the entire world and gather information which includes not only facts as to production abroad but available markets, trade conditions, standing, commercial rating, and general reliability of the firms with which the American exporter must deal, the condition of markets, methods, and tactics of competing firms from other nations, and various other matters of interest to the exporter of American products. This information is dispatched to some 21 offices located throughout the United States and, upon inquiry, directly to any person seeking the information. These inquiries have grown from 200,000 a year in 1921 to 2,400,000. This department has become a great salesman of American products. I think it is safe to estimate that through the efforts of this bureau over one-half billion dollars worth of American products are sold each year.

Through the investigations made by this bureau, he uncovered the plan of foreign governments to force Americans to pay exorbitant prices for products which lent themselves to foreign monopoly. The fight which he made against the British rubber monopoly, which forced the price of rubber from $1.10 a pound to 30 cents a pound, is still fresh in our memory. The United States consumes 70 per cent of the world's raw rubber. A saving to American consumers in this item alone amounts to approximately $700,000,000 a year. He has made the same battle against exorbitant monopoly prices in coffee, nitrate, potash, and other commodities needed by the American people.

His campaign to eliminate waste in industry stands out as one of his greatest achievements. His experts were able to prove that about 30 per cent of our industrial motions amounted to waste motions. Not by force but by cooperation with the manufacturers of the United States he has put over a program of simplified practice, which has resulted in decreasing the number of varieties of products in over 85 industries, with an annual saving of from $286,000,000 to $600,000,000 a year. Illustrations of the decrease in number of these varieties may be shown from the following: Paving bricks, from 66 to 5; milk bottles, from 49 to 9; bed blankets, from 78 to 12; hospital beds, from 33 to 1; hotel chinaware, from 700 to 160; face and common brick, from 39 to 1.

This department has given to the States and to municipalities as well as to individuals definite building guides, with a saving to the builder of from 10 to 20 per cent. More than 100 cities of the United States have embodied these principles into municipal laws.

He has greatly encouraged the building of homes by what is known as "the better homes in America" movement, which now has some 3,600 chapters throughout the United States, teaching people how to own and build their own homes.

This department under his direction also approved a standard zoning act, and now some 580 cities and towns of the United States, representing about half of our urban area, have adopted zoning plans based on the facts and recommendations gathered and issued by the Department of Commerce.

Radio and aviation have also attracted his attention. At his suggestion, Congress has passed adequate laws for the regulation of radio, and has passed an act establishing in the Department of Commerce a division of aviation, which has carried out a program of encouraging national airways, lighted routes, establishing landing fields and preparing charts as aids to aviation.

While carrying on the various duties of his department, he has been assigned to various other jobs of very considerable import. In 1921, President Harding requested him to direct an unemployment conference, which resulted in cooperative efforts to do away with the unemployment then existing in the United States. His efforts were effective. He presided over the St. Lawrence Waterway Commission. He investigated our traffic accidents and arranged coordination between States for the prevention of these accidents. He served on the Foreign Debt Commission, which funded our debts with foreign countries and also served on the advisory committee of the Washington Arms Conference. As chairman of the Colorado River Commission, he settled an interstate quarrel of 20 years' standing and succeeded in having an agreement reached upon the Colorado River compact.

He presided over the International Radio Conference of 74 nations, which settled the points to govern this new force that has become so vital in our very existence.

In 1922 and 1923 he organized and put over the Russian famine relief, through which relief the lives of perhaps 15,000,000 people were saved, and which relief cost some $75,000,000.

His work in the Mississippi flood relief in 1927 remains too fresh in the memory of my hearers to attempt, in any way, to elaborate upon the wonderful results secured by him, except to say that, under his direction, 700,000 refugees were not only rescued, but were fed and by prompt medical attention, saved from pestilence, and reestablished in their homes and farms and that only six lives were lost in the entire process.

On November 6, 1928, Herbert Hoover was elected President of the United States. He was inaugurated March 4, 1929.

At that time most of the countries of the world were in a state of depression. The reaction from the war had set in and the terrible war debts were weighing heavily on the struggling peoples of the world. Conditions became so bad that revolutions occurred in many countries, governments were overthrown and a world of near chaos finally existed. This was bound to react on our own country, and we finally drifted into a very bad depression. This would have been bad enough, but a severe drought occurred in various sections of our country which intensified the seriousness of our situation.

President Hoover was undaunted by the problems that confronted him. His life has been one of solving problems, and he determined to solve this one. He conferred with the leading brains in the industries and institutions of our country, worked as perhaps but few of our Presidents have ever worked, and then set forth a definite plan to bring about our relief. This plan was submitted to the Congress, and it is being enacted into law. Already the country is responding to his plan of relief from the depression. The country is well advised as to his plan, and I will not take time to enter into a discussion of its details.

Fortunately, he has a rugged constitution and an insatiable capacity for work. We are blessed in having such a man at the head of our Government to-day.

Herbert Hoover is indeed a humanitarian and a patriot. He has never accepted salary or expenses in any of his relief work, which has been conducted with such outstanding ability that the overhead has amounted to less than three-eighths of 1 per cent in cost. He has not only given of his services, but has risked his life in many of these ventures. Several times during his career bombs have exploded near to him, causing, perhaps, some slight injury, but his life was spared that he might go on with his work for humanity.

Though many times offered decorations by foreign governments, he has consistently declined these, except perhaps to have bestowed upon him by the King of the Belgians the affectionate title "citizen and friend of the Belgians," or to have some street carry his name, or to witness a demonstration by some 100,000 children whose lives had been saved through his efforts.

Mr. Hoover has been America's agent of good will. He has established American methods and American machinery throughout the world.

He has been loyal to his country and exceedingly loyal to his alma mater, Stanford University, he having had an impermanent home there as early as 1908, which in 1910 became his permanent home. He established his family on the campus, entered his boys in the public schools there. His sons, Herbert, jr., and Allan, are graduates of Stanford University. In 1910, he led the campaign for the Stanford Club, a club and social center embracing the whole university. In 1912 he was named as a trustee of that institution, and his active work on behalf of his alma mater as such trustee might well be the subject of one whole discourse.

While in China he made a collection of rare Chinese books for that institution and has collected the finest war library in the world, which he donated to his alma mater and which, over his protests, now carries the name of the "Hoover war library."

He is an exceedingly charitable man, but makes no ostentation of his charity. He does not believe in indiscriminate giving, but may when accosted by some one on the street ask for his name and address and then through an arrangement with some charitable organization that person will be investigated and if worthy will be assisted, never knowing the name of his benefactor.

No one but himself will probably ever know the number of students who have been assisted in gaining an education through his aid. I sometimes feel that the struggles and sorrows through which he passed in his early life have given to him the great vision which he has and the desire to do good to others.

I once heard a great preacher say over the remains of a charitable woman as she lay cold in death: "Somehow, the eyes that have been washed with tears come to have a clearer vision of the beauties of holiness and of service and of God." I have always felt that this is true of Herbert Hoover.

I wish you could all know Herbert Hoover as I know him. I wish you could have the privilege I have had in joining him at his home at Stanford at an early morning breakfast to discuss matters of interest to his country, or that you could sit with him, as I have, in the twilight hours on his porch overlooking the beautiful Santa Clara Valley, discussing with him the humanities of life. He is shy and reserved; does not like to be praised; blushes if you give him some compliment; and, yet, given a duty to perform becomes a masterful leader.

The loyalty of those who really know him is expressed in the words of one of his lieutenants in the Belgium relief, who said:

Attachment to Hoover tends to the end toward fanaticism.

He is not prone to give compliments, but somehow a few words of commendation from him mean more to one associated with him than volumes of voluble praise from others.

Our country is facing a most critical period in its history, perhaps the greatest since the administration of President Lincoln. Who is better qualified to lead us out of our troubles than Herbert Hoover? He is no stranger to the intrigues of foreign governments. He understands the economic resources, the industrial methods, and the business organizations not only of the United States but of nearly every country of the world. We have perhaps no man in the United States who has the broad vision as to the needs of his own country and of world conditions as has President Hoover. Who will say that he is not the natural leader to carry on the affairs of our Government?

REDUCTION OF SALARIES OF FEDERAL EMPLOYEES

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that the question of wage reduction of those in the Federal service is one that not only involves those who would be directly affected, but may indirectly involve a substantial part of those employed in private industry.

In order for the public to make up their minds as to what action should be taken by the Congress, and by State or city agencies on this question as it affects those in the public service, this subject should be approached and considered from a rational and not from an emotional angle. In viewing this question as it appears to me, there are many elements to be considered, and the main element is "what effect a reduction in salary of those in the public service will have, or tend to have, upon the many millions of employees in private industry."

In this connection we should keep in mind that about a year and a half ago, upon the request of the President, a conference was held in Washington, attended by representatives of leading industries of America, also by William Green, representing the American Federation of Labor, at which the representatives of industry promised the President, and through him, the American people, that there would be no wage reductions, and President Green, likewise promised that organized labor would make no effort to increase wages during the period of depression. The promise given by the representative of the American Federation of Labor has been kept; the promises given by the representatives in industry have not been adhered to. Throughout the country reduction of wages has taken place to an extent that, if known, would amaze the American people.

A reduction in wages of Federal employees would constitute a condonation of the action of the industrial leaders in violating their solemn word, given to the President, and would justify, in their own minds at least, further reductions in salaries of those who are in their employ.

During periods of prosperity the employee is usually the last element to be considered favorably, and when depression visits us they are the first class affected in industry. Instead of trying to cut down operating expenses in many respects, which will not affect the employee, so far as work is concerned, instead of reducing the watered capital and so trying to earn a dividend upon the actual or real capitalization, instead of reducing expenses along these and other lines first, when a depression comes, the first consideration with reference to retrenchment is usually the employee.

What has happened in private industry is just what certain forces are trying to have done with reference to public employees.

The Federal Government spends a tremendous sum of money each year. The greater part of the expenses is necessary, but there are many millions of dollars needlessly wasted annually as a result of the duplication of work by different departments and bureaus which could be saved without any sharp reduction in the working force of the Government. A reorganization of our many bureaus and departments would result in a saving not only to the American public to-day but to the taxpayer to-morrow of a tremendous sum of money. Such a reorganization would also remove many of the bureaucratic tendencies and policies which exist to-day.

The Federal Government through the so-called Federal-aid plan, which is nothing but an indirect way of making constitutional certain legislation that if directly proposed would be unconstitutional, and which is resulting in the absorption by the Federal Government of many State activities, if discontinued with the possible exception of road building, would save the taxpayers well over $100,000,000 each year. Every student of our Government realizes that a Federal-aid program is contrary to the spirit of our scheme of Government. At least during the period of depression this program could be suspended in part, which would result in a tremendous saving to the taxpayers. I refer to the reorganization of departments and bureaus and to the suspension of the Federal-aid program to indicate the tremendous decrease in the cost of Government and the saving to the American taxpayer which could be brought about.

Instead of cutting down wages, which would be hitting only the surface of the cost of Government, why not undertake a real constructive program which contemplates savings in other directions without in the first instance affecting the employee, thereby causing similar action to be taken by private industry, affecting in all probability many millions of workers and their dependents. This is not simply a question of the Federal employees being affected, but I predict that if a reduction in the salaries of Federal employees is put into operation the natural and probable consequence thereof will be further wage reductions in private industry.

Throughout the country a feeling of fear exists. If it could be removed and confidence restored the country would quickly start the journey to a return to normalcy. As we pick up the papers every day, we read of industrial leaders talking about this feeling of fear, resulting in retrenchment in expenses by the worker and in the hoarding of money, and yet the cutting of wages has been one of the main factors of aggravation of this feeling. For the Federal Government to reduce wages at this time would only result in further aggravation of the general feeling of fear which exists. At least, after this unfortunate period of depression is over, let it be said that the Federal Government did nothing which, so far as action toward its employees is concerned, aggravated the existing feeling of insecurity and fear.

This is not alone a question of employment or nonemployment; it is not alone a question of steady or staggering employment; it is not solely a question of whether the Federal employee received an increase during days of prosperity commensurate with the pay of the employee in private industry, nor a question of whether or not they are receiving the wages that they should receive at the present time. The main issue resolves itself into the important question as to what effect a decrease in the salaries of public employees will have not only upon purchasing power but upon the millions of employees in private industry and upon a more speedy return to normalcy.

A governmental wage reduction, producing in turn a further reduction among private employers, would constitute a step which would not only aggravate existing conditions but would contribute toward a prolongation of the present period of depression.

A rational examination of this question indicates clearly that a reduction in the wages of those in the public service is very unwise.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1932

Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D. D., pastor of the Foundry Methodist Episcopal Church of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, we acknowledge Thee as the sovereign ruler of our lives. Our hearts are restless till they find rest in Thee, until Thy completeness flows round our incompleteness and round our restlessness Thy rest.

We thank Thee that in hours when some red cup of sorrow has been put in our trembling hands, when some thorned crown of bitter loss or deep anxiety has stabbed our brow, when some grim cross of sacrificial service has loomed ahead in the path of duty we have made the supreme discovery that we are not alone. As we do the right as Thou givest us to see the right, we do not stand alone, we do not walk alone, nor struggle alone nor suffer alone. Always Thou art closer than breathing, nearer than hands or feet.

Knowing our own failing and falling, give us toward our comrades sympathy and tolerance and a love that sees the best that glimmers through the worst. In these confused and confusing days save us from the paralysis of pessimism and cynicism. May our glad hearts thrill at the beckoning challenge of being partners with Thee, our redeeming God, in building a world where truth and righteousness, justice and love shall one day cover the earth as the waters cover the sea.

We ask it in that name which is above every name. Amen.

REORGANIZATION OF THE EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS (H. DOC. NO. 254)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Because of its direct relation to the cost of government, I desire again to bring to the attention of the Congress the necessity of more effective organization of the executive branch of the Government, the importance of which I have referred to in previous messages. This subject has been considered many times by the Executive and by the Congress, but without substantial results. Various projects are now before the Congress.

The need for reorganization is obvious. There has been with the years a gradual growth of the Government by the accretion in its departments and by independent executive establishments, boards, and commissions as problems requiring solution confront the President and the Congress. To-day the Government embraces from 150 to 200 separate units, dependent on the method of notation used. Governmental units when once set up have a tendency to grow independently of other units. This leads to overlapping and waste. Moreover, there is a marked tendency to find new occupations when the initial duties are completed. The overlap and the number of agencies can be reduced.

A few consolidations, notably in law enforcement and the veterans' services, have been effected. Both of these reorganized agencies have been able to discharge the very greatly increased burdens imposed upon them without such an increase in administrative expense as would otherwise have been the case.

In the present crisis the absolute necessity for the most drastic economy makes the problem of governmental reorganization one of paramount importance. The amount of saving in public funds to be effected by a thoroughgoing reorganization, while difficult to estimate accurately, will be material, amounting to many millions of dollars annually. Not only will the Government's business be conducted more efficiently and economically but the great body of citizens who have business relations with their Government will be relieved of the burden and expense of dealing with a multitude of unnecessary and sometimes widely separated public agencies.

We may frankly admit the practical difficulties of such reorganization. Not only do different fractions of the Government fear such reorganization, but many associations and agencies throughout the country will be alarmed that the particular function to which they are devoted may in some fashion be curtailed. Proposals to the Congress of detailed plans for the reorganization of the many different bureaus and independent agencies have always proved in the past to be a signal for the mobilization of opposition from all quarters which has destroyed the possibility of constructive action.

There is little hope for success in this task unless it is placed in the hands of some one responsible for it, with authority and direction to act. Moreover, the consummation of a comprehensive reorganization at one moment is not in the best public interest. Such reorganization should be undertaken gradually and systematically, predicated on a sound and definite theory of government and effectuated as the result of study and experience gained in the actual processes of reorganization.

I recommend, therefore, that the Congress provide for—

(a) Consolidation and grouping of the various executive and administrative activities according to their major purposes under single-headed responsibility, the Congress designating the title of the officer to be placed in immediate charge of such groups as are not now possible under existing organization.

(b) Adoption of the general principle that executive and administrative functions should have single-headed responsibility and that advisory, regulatory, and quasi judicial functions should be performed by boards and commissions, thus permitting the transfer of certain regulatory functions from executive officials to existing boards or commissions and executive functions from boards and commissions to executive officials.

(c) Authority under proper safeguards to be lodged in the President to effect these transfers and consolidations and authority to redistribute executive groups in the 10 executive departments of the Government or in the independent establishments, as the President may determine, by Executive order, such Executive order to lie before the Congress for 60 days during sessions thereof before becoming effective, but becoming effective at the end of such period unless the Congress shall request suspension of action.

The 10 major executive departments and the major regulatory and financial boards and commissions should of course be maintained. Some of these existing agencies are already organized upon the basis of their major purpose, but functions of the same major purpose now outside of these groups should be transferred to them.

It will be necessary also to authorize changes in titles of some officials and to create a few new positions in order to permit grouping and consolidation not now possible. With the enormous growth of governmental business there has been great expansion and diffusion of authority amongst minor officials. At the same time, there is an insufficient number of officials of definite and concentrated responsibility to the public. The additional expense of such officers over and above the salaries now paid to officials who would be displaced would be less than $40,000 per annum. The saving in cost of administration would be many times this sum. The most important of the posts of this character are the following:

Public Works Administrator (new office).

Personnel Administrator (change from chairman of Civil Service Commission).

Assistant Secretary for Public Health (new).

Assistant Secretary for Education (change from commissioner).

Assistant Secretary for Merchant Marine (new office).

Assistant Secretary for Conservation (new office).

Assistant Secretary for Agricultural Research (change from present Assistant Secretary).

Assistant Secretary for Agricultural Economics (change from director).

The establishment of an Assistant Secretary for Merchant Marine would enable the consummation of the proposals in my message of December 8 in respect to the Shipping Board.

The public works administration should be partially a service agency to the other departments of the Government, executing certain construction work, the subsequent operation of which should be carried on by those departments. It should be also partially an agency administering certain contract work which can not be delegated to any one department. Naval, military, and some other highly specialized construction work should not be transferred to this agency. The supervision and construction of rivers and harbors work should be continued under direction of the Army engineers, who should be delegated by the Secretary of War to the service of the Administrator of Public Works for this purpose.

The personnel administration should comprise various agencies relating to the personnel of the Government as a service agency to all departments of the Government. I recommend that the Civil Service Commission should be maintained as an advisory body to the Personnel Administrator, and the approval of this body should be required in all regulatory questions. The Personnel Administrator should be the chairman of the commission. Other functions relating to the personnel of the Government should be transferred to the personnel administration as may be deemed wise from time to time.

RECLAMATION SERVICE

With respect to certain agencies in the Government, I recommend a separate legislative reorganization of policy. The first of these is the Reclamation Service. Reclamation should have a broader import than that of bringing unproductive land under cultivation. We do not need further additions to our agricultural land at present. Additional agricultural production except such marginal expansion as present projects warrant is inadvisable.

The conservation of water by storage is required, not alone in the West, but in all parts of the country.

The effective development of water conservation through storage is largely an interstate question in the aid of domestic and industrial water supply, transportation, irrigation, and flood control. Where construction work for storage relates to these larger issues, it is properly the work of the Federal Government. Where water power is developed as a by-product, it should be disposed of in advance by contracts which will fairly reimburse the Government for its outlay The Reclamation Service should be extended to cover these broad purposes of storage and conservation of water rather than the narrow purpose of irrigation. Such important projects as the dam at Boulder Canyon, the dam at Cove Creek, and the development of the Columbia, should ultimately be undertaken when there is need for such service and when contracts can be made for the sale of power to amortize the cost of construction to the Government. The actual construction work under this plan should be carried out by the public works administrator and the completed projects administered by the Reclamation Service.

CONSERVATION OF WESTERN RANGES

There should be a change in policy in dealing with public lands if we are to preserve their value for grazing and other purposes. The committee on conservation and administration of the public domain, authorized by act of the Congress approved April 10, 1930, completed the task assigned to it a year ago. Its report has been transmitted to Members of the Congress. Legislation carrying into effect the recommendation of the committee also is before the Congress. These proposals are the result of painstaking study and earnest deliberation. They offer a solution of the problems, connected with this remnant of our public domain, which have persisted for the past 25 years. I commend the report to the attention of the Congress, deeming the legislation of sufficient importance to justify early action.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion, I can not recommend too strongly that the Congress give the subject of effective organization of the executive branch of the Government its early and serious attention. It is an essential part of a sound reconstruction and economy program. A patchwork organization compels inefficiency, waste, and extravagance. Economy and efficiency can come only through modernization. A proper reorganization of our departments, commissions, and bureaus will result not only in much greater efficiency and public convenience but in the saving of many millions of dollars now extracted annually from our overburdened taxpayers.

HERBERT HOOVER.

A. HUTCHINS, Acting Secretary.

GRAZING FEES IN NATIONAL FORESTS

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram from Mr. J. W. Wilson, jr., president of the Beaver Creek (Wyo.) Cattlemen's Association; also copy of a telegram to the Secretary of Agriculture by B. F. Davis, secretary of the Colorado Cattle Growers and Feeders Association, together with resolution passed by that association at a recent meeting, these all relating to reduction of grazing fees in national forests.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHERIDAN, WYO., February 16, 1932.

Senator ROBERT D. CAREY,
Washington, D. C.:

Have just been advised by Wyoming Stock Growers Association of your efforts to have grazing fees reduced on national-forest reserves. The Beaver Creek Cattlemen's Association heartily approve your resolution and wish you all success in its passage. With cattle prices ruinously low, the industry is in desperate need of every assistance.

J. W. WILSON, Jr., President.

[Telegram]

JANUARY 20, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR M. HYDE,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.:

We condemn the action of the Department of the Forest Service in refusing to adjust grazing fees in accordance with the present economic situation. Department in writing section 6, Greeley letter, January 25, 1927, recognized that grazing fees would be regulated when necessary with relation to valuation of livestock. You now disregard this principle entirely. We demand immediate conference at Denver for purpose of adjusting range fees 1931 and 1932. Reply requested.

B. F. DAVIS, Secretary.

Colorado Stock Growers and Feeders Association and Colorado Wool Growers Association, at their annual meeting held in Denver, Colo., on the 20th day of January, 1932, adopted the following joint resolution:

"Be it resolved, That the Department of Agriculture has not kept faith with the stockmen of the West in reference to the charges for grazing privileges on forest areas. Before forest areas were set aside it was represented orally and in writing that charges for the use of said areas for grazing purposes would be based upon the cost of administration, and that the Federal Government would not seek directly or indirectly to obtain a revenue out of the lands so placed in forest areas. Disregarding these representations the charges have now been placed upon the basis 'what the traffic will bear,' and a large amount of money above the cost of administration is annually turned to the Federal Government from the Forest Service. We demand that the Federal Government keep faith with the West and that Congress pass an act basing charges for grazing on all portions of the public unappropriated domain, whether forest or otherwise, at fees that will not exceed reasonable cost of administration."

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, Hon. Harry S. Joseph, a member of the executive committee of the Make Work Committee in my State, asks that the telegram which I present be read into the RECORD. Complying with that request, I do so. The message is as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, February 13, 1932.

Hon. W. H. KING,
Washington, D. C.:

Have wired President Hoover following message: "What provision, if any, will be made by the Federal Government in affording financial aid to Utah's mining industry through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation? It appears to me and others that necessary financial assistance would serve to solve some of our unemployment problems in this State." Please have my message read into CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

HARRY S. JOSEPH,
Member Executive Committee, Make Work Committee.

I ask that this telegram be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

REGULATION OF SALE OF FEDERAL FARM BOARD COTTON

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to regulate the sale of cotton owned or financed and controlled by the Federal Farm Board, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3697) to regulate the sale of cotton owned or financed and controlled by the Federal Farm Board, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter it shall be unlawful for the Cotton Stabilization Corporation or the Federal Farm Board, or for any representative or successor thereof, to buy any cotton either "spot" or futures contracts, or to sell or exchange any such cotton or futures contracts owned or financed and controlled by said corporation or board except as hereinafter prescribed and permitted.

SEC. 2. It shall be unlawful for said corporation or board, or for any representative or successor thereof, to sell any cotton, either spot or futures contracts, owned or financed and controlled by such corporation or board prior to January 1, 1933, for less than 12 cents per pound, basis middling at New Orleans or other United States ports: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the sale of futures contracts owned or financed and controlled by the said corporation or board at prices less than those fixed or determined as prescribed in this act, upon condition that simultaneous replacements of equal quantities of deferred contracts are made.

SEC. 3. That the differentials at which spot cotton and futures contracts owned or financed and controlled by the said corporation or board at points other than the above-described ports may be sold prior to January 1, 1933, at less than New Orleans spot price, shall be the equivalent of the lowest rate for transportation of cotton from the place in which it is stored to the nearest United States port.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED

The bill (H. R. 8397) making appropriations for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 4th of January I introduced Senate bill 2488, to abolish the Bureau of Efficiency, and for other purposes. I find that that bill was improperly referred to the Committee on Appropriations. It should have gone to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on the 4th of January I also introduced Senate bill 2491, which, in my opinion, was improperly referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. It is entitled "A bill to prohibit the use of the mails in furtherance of bucketshop transactions and short sales of securities." The bill should have gone to the Committee on Banking and Currency. I ask that the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be discharged from its further consideration and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment proposing to provide for emergency construction on public roads during the remainder of the calendar year 1932 with a view to increasing employment by appropriating $120,000,000 for apportionment to the several States under the provisions of the Federal highway act, as amended; $5,000,000 for the construction and improvement of highways within the boundaries of the national forests; $5,000,000 for the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, etc., in the national forests; $1,500,000 for the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails in the national parks and national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department; $1,000,000 for the construction and improvement of Indian reservation roads under the provisions of law; and $3,000,000 for the construction of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, and so forth, intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7912, the agricultural appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ODDIE subsequently, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which the above amendment was referred, reported favorably thereon and moved that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, which was agreed to.

EMERGENCY CREDIT EXPANSION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. BLAINE submitted two amendments and Mr. BROOKHART, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SELMA A. TRACY

Mr. WATSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 168), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1931, to Selma A. Tracy, widow of Archie W. Tracy, late assistant superintendent of the Senate press gallery, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

RAILWAY MERGERS

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce Senate Resolution 164, submitted by myself on the 10th instant, and which is now on the table. Before I do that I should like to amend the resolution by adding the names of two railroads that were unintentionally omitted, if I may have unanimous consent to do so.

Mr. McNARY. Is the request to take from the desk the resolution at this time and consider it?

Mr. DILL. No. I am asking that the resolution may be amended or modified and then referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to have that committee consider the wisdom of the requests and whether or not others ought to be added.

Mr. McNARY. I think the resolution should go to the Interstate Commerce Committee. I am very happy that the Senator is going to ask that reference.

Mr. DILL. That is my purpose, but I first want to modify the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The Senator has the right to modify his resolution.

Mr. DILL. On page 2, in line 14, after the word "Company," I desire to insert the words "the New York Central Railroad Co. and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co.," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed, first, forthwith to transmit to the Senate a full and complete transcript of the testimony taken in Commission Docket No. 12964, Consolidation of Railroads into a Limited Number of Systems, on January 6, 7, 8, and 9, 1932; second, as promptly as practicable, to transmit to the Senate a full and complete statement and analysis of all holdings of stock and bonds in any railroad or holding company affected by or interested in the so-called 4-system plan for the eastern region, dated October 1, 1931, now under consideration by said commission, to the extent that such holdings of stock or bonds are by or on behalf of any railroad corporation, holding company, or trustee, affected by or interested in said 4-system plan, such statement and analysis to include the number of shares of stock with their par value and the par value of all bonds together with their original cost per share or per $100 of par value of bonds and their total cost and also to include their present worth at the market prices current at the latest available date; third, as promptly as possible, to transmit to the Senate balance sheets of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., the Pennsylvania Co., the Pennroad Corporation, the Alleghany Corporation, the Chesapeake Corporation, the Van Sweringen Corporation, the Virginia Transportation Corporation, the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Co., the New York Central Railroad Co., and the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., as of the latest date available, showing in detail all the holdings of said corporations in other corporations with the amounts at which each and every of said holdings are carried on the books of said corporations and their value at current market prices; and, fourth, as promptly as possible, to transmit to the Senate a detailed statement of all moneys obtained by any railroad corporation or other corporations herein referred to by the sale or hypothecation of any stock, bonds, or equipment obligations at any time within the six years that ended with December 31, 1931.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the resolution as modified will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

COMMITTEE SERVICE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would like to have the attention of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. I ask that the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY] be assigned to the minority vacancy upon the Committee on Civil Service.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that assignment will be made.

SENATE OFFICE BUILDING COMMISSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is the minority member of the Senate Office Building Commission. The Senator from Virginia is necessarily absent from the Senate, and it is expected that his absence will continue until the end of the present session. I therefore ask that the Senator from Virginia be for the present excused from service on the Senate Office Building Commission, and that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] be assigned to the minority position on that commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that assignment will be made.

TERMS OF PRESIDENT, VICE PRESIDENT, AND MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of said Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided in the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 24th day of January, and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 4th day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

"SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 4th day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

"SEC. 3. If the President elect dies, then the Vice President elect shall become President. If a President is not chosen before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, or if the President elect fails to qualify, then the Vice President elect shall act as President until a President has qualified; and the Congress may by law provide for the case where neither a President elect nor a Vice President elect has qualified, declaring who shall then act as President, or the manner in which a qualified person shall be selected, and such person shall act accordingly until a President or Vice President has qualified.

"SEC. 4. The Congress may by law provide for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the House of Representatives may choose a President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, and for the case of the death of any of the persons from whom the Senate may choose a Vice President whenever the right of choice devolves upon them.

"SEC. 5. Sections 1 and 2 shall take effect on the 30th day of November of the year following the year in which this article is ratified.

"SEC. 6. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress, and the act of ratification shall be by legislatures, the entire membership of at least one branch of which shall have been elected subsequent to such date of submission."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, ask for a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I inquire what is the effect of the amendment adopted by the House?

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of fact, it is put in the form of one amendment and it follows the Senate joint resolution with one or two exceptions, where slight changes have been made which are of no particular fundamental importance.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator prefers, however, to have the joint resolution go to conference?

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is no doubt that the differences can reasonably be threshed out in conference without the consumption of much time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not wish unduly to intrude upon the time of the Senator from Nebraska, but in view of the motion which he, as chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, has made—and I think he did well to make the motion—I desire to submit an observation.

One of the vital changes which the House of Representatives made in the so-called "lame duck" amendment to the Constitution is that the amendment, in order to become effective and operative, must be ratified within seven years from the date of its submission. There is a considerable difference of opinion amongst lawyers, historians, and antiquarians as to whether or not there can be imposed any limitation as to time of ratification in the case of an amendment that is submitted. I believe that a limitation of the time within which an amendment may be ratified is sound and necessary, and for the following reasons:

Five different amendments proposed by the Congress are, by some persons, assumed now to be pending before the States for their action. These amendments are as follows:

One proposed September 29, 1789, 143 years ago, relating to enumeration and representation:

ARTICLE I. After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be 1 Representative for every 30,000 until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives, nor less than 1 Representative for every 40,000 persons, until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000 persons.

Another, proposed September 29, 1789, 143 years ago, relating to compensation of Members of Congress:

ART. II. No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

Another, proposed January 12, 1810, 122 years ago, to prohibit citizens of the United States from accepting presents, pensions, or titles from princes or from foreign powers:

If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them, or either of them.

Another, proposed March 2, 1861, 71 years ago, known as the Corwin amendment, prohibiting Congress from interfering with slavery within the States:

No amendment shall be made to the Constitution which will authorize or give to Congress the power to abolish or interfere, within any State, with the domestic institutions thereof, including that of persons held to labor or service by the laws of said State. (12 Stat. 251.)

And still another, proposed June 2, 1924, the child labor amendment:

SECTION 1. The Congress shall have power to limit, regulate, and prohibit the labor of persons under 18 years of age.

SEC. 2. The power of the several States is unimpaired by this article except that the operation of State laws shall be suspended to the extent necessary to give effect to legislation enacted by the Congress.

On September 29, 1789, 12 constitutional amendments were proposed by the First Congress. The requisite number of States ratified proposed articles Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 within two years and three months, while Nos. 1 and 2, although proposed 143 years ago, have not, according to the latest available returns, received favorable action by the requisite number of States and are yet before the American people or the States; rather, are now subject to ratification or rejection by the States. After those two proposed amendments, to wit: Nos. 1 and 2, had been in nubibus—in the clouds—for 84 years, the Ohio State Senate in 1873, in response to a tide of indignation that swept over the land in opposition to the so-called back-salary grab, resurrected proposed amendment No. 2 and passed a resolution of ratification through the State senate. No criticism can be visited upon the Ohio Legislature that attempted to ratify the amendment proposed in 1789; and if the amendment had been freshly proposed by Congress at the time of the back-salary grab, instead of having been drawn forth from musty tomes, where it had so long lain idle, stale, and dormant, other States doubtless would have ratified it during the period from 1873 to 1881.

Thus it would seem that a period of 143 years within which a State may act is altogether too long. We should not hand down to posterity a conglomerate mass of amendments floating around in a nebulous haze, which a State here may resurrect and ratify and a State there may galvanize and ratify.

We ought to have homogeneous, steady, united exertion, and certainly we should have contemporaneous action with reference to proposed amendments. Judgment on the case should be rendered within the lifetime of those interested in bringing about the change in our fundamental law. Final action should be had while the discussions and arguments are within the remembrance of those who are called upon to act.

The amendment proposed on January 12, 1810, was submitted to the States under peculiar auspices.

It is probable that the Congress which submitted that amendment believed that when officials accept presents of value they dissolve the pearl of independence in the vinegar of obligation.

Unfortunately, the annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the annals is the remarks of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country."

What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent, but it is possible that the presence of Jerome Bonaparte in this country a few years previous and his marriage to a Maryland lady, may have suggested this amendment.

An article in Niles' Register, volume 72, page 166, written many years after this event, refers to an amendment having been adopted to prevent any but native-born citizens from being President of the United States. This is, of course, a mistake, as the Constitution in its original form contained such a provision; but it may be possible that the circumstances referred to by the writer in Niles' relate to the passage through Congress of this amendment. The article referred to maintains that at the time Jerome Bonaparte was in this country the Federalist Party, as a political trick, affecting to apprehend that Jerome might find his way to the Presidency through "French influence," proposed the amendment. The Federalists thought the Democrats would oppose the amendment as unnecessary, which would thus appear to the public as a further proof of their subserviency to French influence. The Democrats, to avoid this imputation, concluded to carry the amendment.

"It can do no harm" was what reconciled all to the amendment.

That amendment was submitted by Congress 122 years ago, and it was ratified within two years by Maryland, Kentucky, Ohio, Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Vermont, Tennessee, Georgia, North Carolina, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire. It was rejected by two or three of the States. At one period of our national life the histories and the public men announced that it was a part of our organic law, and this error arose because in the early days of our Government the Secretary of State did not send messages to Congress announcing ratification and did not promulgate any notice as to when an amendment became a part of the Constitution. I have caused the journals, records, and files in the Department of State to be searched, and there may not be found any notice of any proclamation of the ratification of the first 10 amendments to the Constitution. The States assumed—it was not an unwarranted or violent assumption—that when the requisite number of States had ratified an amendment it was then and there a part of our organic law.

On March 2, 1861, the Corwin amendment, quoted above, was proposed by Congress.

There are not a thousand persons in the United States who know that such an amendment is now pending before the various States of the Union for their ratification. The amendment was ratified by the State of Ohio and by the State of Maryland through their legislatures, and was attempted to be ratified by the State of Illinois in 1862 by a convention.

Thus we perceive that a system which permits of no limitation as to the time when an amendment may be voted upon by the State legislatures is not fair to posterity or to the present generation. It keeps historians, publishers, and annalists, as well as the general public, constantly in doubt.

Having searched closely as to whether there is in the Constitution itself any expressed or implied limitation of time as to when an amendment may be adopted, I am driven irresistibly to the conclusion, with all due deference to the opinion in Dillon v. Gloss (256 U. S. Repts. 368) that an amendment to the Constitution once having been duly proposed, although proposed as remotely as September 29, 1789, may not be recalled even by the unanimous vote of both Houses, if the Congress wished the same recalled, because the power to submit an amendment is specifically pointed out; but no power is given to recall the same, and silence is negation.

I am of opinion that a State which rejects a proposed amendment may, of course, at any time thereafter ratify the same, and a State which adopts or ratifies a proposed amendment may withdraw its ratification, provided it withdraws such ratification before the required number of States shall have ratified. I incline to the view of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate [Mr. NORRIS] that a general amendment should be adopted dealing specifically with the particular subject so that there may be some uniformity and certainty as to the length of time within which a proposed amendment to the Constitution may be ratified.

That is all I care to say now, as the joint resolution will go to conference and the differences may be composed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think there is wisdom in what the Senator from Arizona has just stated. There ought to be a limitation upon all amendments proposed to the Constitution; the States ought to be required to act one way or the other within a limited time. However, my own judgment is that that ought to be brought about by separate amendment to the Constitution amending the provision of the Constitution relating to the submission of amendments, and that we ought to state in that just what time should elapse before a proposed amendment, if not ratified within that time, would become void.

I do not believe it is good practice continually to tack on to amendments to the Constitution a limitation as to a particular amendment that does not apply to all other amendments. I should favor a constitutional amendment that would settle that difficulty. I agree entirely with the Senator from Arizona that these amendments ought to be disposed of by the people some time within reasonable limits, and not let posterity take up a proposal and pass on it after everybody has forgotten about it; but personally I am not in favor of tacking that limitation on this amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me illustrate one of the vices or possibilities that not only might but did grow out of an amendment pending so long.

I think about 1873 Congress passed what was called in common parlance the "back-salary grab," and there was at that time pending, and had been since 1789, an amendment prohibiting that very act. The Legislature of Ohio, in indignation at the so-called back-salary grab, picked up this amendment, which had been floating in the clouds since 1789, and one of the two houses of the Legislature of Ohio ratified that hoary old proposed amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is true. It illustrates what might happen on any amendment that is submitted; but, in my judgment, it is manifestly unfair to tack on to any proposed amendment to the Constitution a limitation that does not apply and that will not apply to every amendment to the Constitution. Personally, I think seven years is long enough; so that fundamentally I have no objection to that, except that it ought to be a general amendment to the Constitution. I have long had it in my mind to propose such an amendment; but, as everybody knows, it is a very difficult thing to get amendments submitted in the first place.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Under the circumstances, Mr. President, I am satisfied that the joint resolution should go to conference.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, thanks to the courtesy of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, a subcommittee is now sitting and started hearings yesterday on various proposals for amending the fifth article of the Constitution, which, Senators will remember, deals with the question of amendments and how they may be submitted and how they may be adopted.

In the hearings yesterday there was suggested, as a proper clause to be added to whatever amendment the committee reports out, the very provision referred to by the Senator from Nebraska a few minutes ago—that all amendments must be passed upon within five or seven years, or else become of no validity. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will aid and assist us in seeing to it that this amendment to Article V is perfected in accordance with those lines.

May I say, Mr. President, that the principal reason given by the advocates of a change in Article V is that the Supreme Court has decided by various decisions that it is impossible for the citizens of a State to pass a law or an amendment to their own constitution providing that their legislature, before passing on an amendment to the Constitution, must have been elected at an election subsequent to the submission by the Congress of the amendment to the Constitution. Furthermore, the Supreme Court has decided that plebiscites or referenda held in the States, in accordance with State practice, having to do with amendments to the Constitution of the United States are of no effect and are not binding on the State legislature.

The proposals before the subcommittee are various. One proposal is that all amendments to the Constitution be submitted to the people of the several States for vote; another, that all amendments having to do with the powers of the Federal Government over the people be submitted to conventions to be chosen for that purpose; and another, that all amendments having to do with the powers of the Federal Government over the people be submitted to the people themselves.

I hope very much that the Senator from Nebraska, the chairman of the committee, will give the Senate an opportunity to debate and to pass upon whatever amendment to Article V his committee finds will best meet the needs of the situation as we find it to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator that I am in favor of amending Article V of the Constitution; and a great many suggestions are made as to how it should be amended. I hope they can be threshed out and that some agreement can be reached and the matter submitted to the legislatures. However, I am not in favor of coupling with the amendment some other proposition that would amend the Constitution in some other respect. The amendment of Article V ought to stand alone and by itself, and apply, in my opinion, to all amendments alike. One of the Senator's propositions attempts to differentiate between different kinds of amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And that principle ought to be preserved throughout.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. All amendments to the Constitution of the United States ought to be separately considered and acted upon, and should never be combined with other amendments except in the cases where it is necessary to give effect to the primary amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment.

This particular amendment made by the House to the proposed amendment now under consideration not only provides that it shall be agreed to in seven years, but it provides that at least one branch of the legislature of each State must be elected after the submission of this amendment. I think we all understand the principle involved in that—so that there may be more or less an issue of this particular amendment involved in the various campaigns for the election of a legislature.

As a member of my State I would not favor an amendment of that kind, because I would not want to couple with the question of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States the various State questions that might be involved in the election of a legislature. For instance, we can imagine all kinds of issues of a State nature, a local nature, that might be involved in the election of a legislature in that State; and if we coupled with it and threw into those local matters a national issue as to whether or not certain amendments should be approved, it might result in that issue overshadowing the real local issue upon which the legislature of the State had jurisdiction. So I think we ought not particularly to add to the proposal the provision that is added to this one, because it might result in the defeat of an amendment to the Constitution that everybody in the State voting against it wanted, because when the voter was going to vote for a member of the legislature he would be confronted with the ideas of that candidate on local matters that were directly at issue in that campaign, and also confronted with the ideas of the candidate on the national amendment. So he might be up against the proposition that the man he wanted to vote for, who agreed with him on the State issues, would be absolutely on the other side of the fence on the national issue, and there would be no way for a voter really to express his views when he cast his ballot.

Mr. BINGHAM and Mr. BROOKHART addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the Senator permit me to say that he has just given the most cogent and logical reason for a change in Article V, for the reason that at present practically the only way we can get an amendment to the Constitution adopted is through the legislatures whose members are elected for quite other objects.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, since the Constitution provides only two methods of ratification—one by the legislatures and the other by conventions—and gives Congress the right to say which method shall be adopted, when Congress provides that the legislatures shall ratify has it any further power to say what legislature, or how selected, or anything about it? Is not that for the States to decide?

Mr. NORRIS. It presents—and that is involved in this amendment—a constitutional question of great importance, as to whether we can impose a limitation that is not already imposed by the Constitution itself when we seek to amend it. I think it is a very serious question whether or not such a limitation has any legal effect; but if I had my own way about it I would not submit to a legislature elected upon a different issue the question as to whether they should have the authority to pass upon amendments to the Constitution, because we ought not to interfere with the State in the election of members of its legislature who have nothing of a national character connected with their duties, and who are elected often upon sharp, well-defined issues of a State nature entirely. By putting into that contest a national issue that has no connection with the State issue we have often confronted the electorate with a problem that is impossible of solution in a way that is satisfactory to the man who casts his ballot. I do not know that it is necessary to state what I would do in that case if I had my way about it, because that is not involved in this matter.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the Senator a question on another phase of the amendment to the Constitution, and ask him whether he has ever given any attention to it.

The people vote for the electors for President under the law in November. Then the electors meet in their various States and vote for President at a different date. Then, at a subsequent date, the vote is sent here and counted in the House of Representatives in February.

Now, this is my query: If, between the time the vote is counted in the Senate and the inauguration, which would be on the 4th of March, both the President elect and the Vice President elect should die, it is stated that there would be an interregnum that is not provided for either in the Constitution or in the laws, and there would be a possibility that we would have a period with no provision for President. The President ends his term on the 4th of March. The Vice President holds until his successor is elected; but in this case, with the President elect and the Vice President elect both removed, the question is whether the electors would be recalled and vote, or whether, when they do vote, they have officially ceased to exist.

The matter has been discussed by constitutional lawyers, and it is believed that there is an interregnum. No effort, so far as I know, has ever been made to amend the Constitution to cover that period. Has the Senator ever given any attention to it?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. It is involved in this amendment. One of the amendments of the House covers that.

Mr. FESS. I was not aware of that.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and it did before in the other amendment.

Mr. President, that reminds me that one of the amendments—the only one made by the House—covers that proposition, a very important thing that ought to be covered. I think everybody concedes it; but there is only one possible objection, which I do not think exists in this case, to that particular amendment. That is, whenever we submit amendments to the Constitution if we couple a whole lot of them together we run the risk of having them all defeated, because one legislature will oppose the proposal on one ground and another will oppose it on some other provision in it.

An amendment was offered in the House of Representatives when this matter was pending there providing for a 4-year term for Members of the House of Representatives and argued to some extent. In the debate in the House of Representatives one of the Members read into the RECORD a speech I made when I was a Member of the House in favor of that kind of a proposition, I suppose using it as an argument, because it was known that I was opposed to having the House put that kind of an amendment on this particular proposal. I was called upon by a good many Members of the House with regard to that amendment before it was offered and after it had been offered. I strenuously objected to their putting any such amendment on this proposed amendment to the Constitution but not because I was opposed to making the terms of Members of the House longer. I still believe that the Constitution ought to be amended and that Members of the House of Representatives should be elected for four years instead of two.

It seems to me that two years is too short a term, although the proposed amendment, if carried through, will help the matter to a great extent, because the Members elect will actually get into harness long before they do now. They will go into office in January after they are elected in November. The only objection I would have to putting that amendment, or any other amendment like it, on the proposed constitutional amendment would be the danger of killing the whole thing before a legislature through putting too much in it. No doubt some proposition about which there is no dispute, which I think is the case with the so-called "lame duck" amendment, will be approved by the legislatures; but if a legislature could not approve it without approving something else the legislature did not want, they might not approve anything.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NORRIS, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. WALSH of Montana conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE CHRISTIAN WAY OUT

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD excerpts which appear in the New York Times from an article "The Christian Way Out," by the distinguished American scholar, Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, president of Columbia University, which article appeared in the current issue of the Witness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

It must be bluntly said that a very considerable proportion of the American people, and a still greater proportion of our representatives in official life, continue to show no real appreciation of what has happened to the world or of what is going on all about them. These elements of our population and these public officials continue to use old phrases, old slogans, and old rallying cries, as if these really meant something, being quite oblivious to the fact that they have wholly lost whatever meaning they may once have had.

It is not possible to describe or to discuss present-day problems without repetition. What is now being said has been said before by way of warning and of preparation. Apparently it will probably have to be said many times again before public opinion wakes from its sleep and before public officials, high and low, perceive their responsibility and have courage to act upon it.

The economic, social, and the political convulsions which are shaking the whole world are without a parallel in history. It is quite futile to draw curves and to make charts of how earlier depressions and economic crises in the United States have developed and how they have led the way to recovery. This procedure is wholly futile, because conditions are entirely without precedent, and the remedies for these conditions will have to be without precedent as well.

Two great historic movements happened to reach a climax at about one and the same time, and the effect has been to overturn the world as our fathers knew it. These two movements are, first, competitive and armed nationalism, and second, the industrial revolution which followed hard upon the invention and installation of machinery a century ago. Armed and competitive nationalism went to its natural death in the great World War. If nations insist upon huge armaments under the guise of self-defense, and if they look upon all neighboring nations as envious competitors and potential enemies, war is the natural and almost necessary result. These wars were not particularly important when armies were small and instruments of destruction simple and of short range. As the Great War showed, conditions are wholly different in these respects to-day. Tens of millions of men are involved, whole continents are subject to ravage and outrage, and innocent men, women, and children 50 miles away may be sent to their death without knowing what it is all about. With airships and poison gases at the disposal of all combatants, another war would be far more destructive than the Great War showed itself to be. Unless the nations of the earth keep their word which they gave when they solemnly pledged themselves not to resort to war as an instrument of national policy, civilization may yet be destroyed in what is almost the twinkling of an eye.

The Great War not only caused the stupendous losses of which everyone knows, but it destroyed a very large part of the accumulated savings of the world through 300 years. This is the primary cause of the present economic, social, and political crisis. Men's savings have in large part disappeared, having been burned up in the killing, the pillage, and the appalling expenditure which were the Great War. Not only were these accumulated savings destroyed, but the trade, the commerce, and the industry of the world were all disrupted. The seas were no longer safe and the land was almost everywhere in possession of armed and fighting forces.

To all this there came an armistice on November 11, 1918. It was a cessation of hostilities so far as military and naval operations were concerned. It was not a cessation of hostilities as far as mental processes and political policies were concerned. The Great War is still going on, although without the aid of armies and navies. Greedy, envious, and self-centered nationalism is everywhere manifesting itself, and every nation's hand is more or less openly raised against its neighbor. Many parts of the war settlement are based upon hate and others upon fear, forgetful of the fact that neither hate nor fear will serve as foundation for the building of human satisfaction and of peace.

The effects of the Great War would have been sufficient by themselves to have disrupted the world as it was. Almost simultaneously there came to a climax the effects of the industrial revolution. Men had learned, by the use of machinery and by building large business organizations, enormously to increase the production of goods. They had developed the instrumentalities for the exchange of those products, but they had quite overlooked the necessity of augmenting the power to consume in ways that would keep pace with the growth of the power to produce.

In one sense there is overproduction because there are natural products and manufactured goods that are not sold. On the other hand, there is underconsumption because there are millions of human beings who need these natural products and these manufactured goods to keep them alive, to cover their nakedness, and to house their families, but who have not the wherewithal with which to acquire them. It is to be noted that these forces are in operation all over the world. They produce somewhat more acute effects in one country or in one section than in another, but nevertheless they are operative everywhere. No nation is competent to deal with these situations single handed. The forces at work and the problems which they have created are international, and the ways of dealing with them must be international, too. Time is slipping away and conditions are growing steadily worse, and yet we find holders of public office in our own land and in other lands looking helplessly about and trying to find ways and means to care for their own people first. This can not be done, because there is no way to do it. There are very few national problems left in any land. Almost every important problem of government, of industry, of commerce, of trade, and finance is international in its every aspect. Those who would bid us mind our own business use words with a meaning that would have us neglect the chief part of that business which is our own. 'Am I my brother's keeper?' insolently asked Cain, and he quickly found out the true answer. So we, too, are other brothers' keepers. Each nation is a moral personality with a mind and heart and soul. Each nation is a member of the great commonwealth of nations, with duties and responsibilities like to those which the individual man has toward his neighbors and fellow citizens. What the world needs is voices and acts of leadership that will point the way, that will rouse men from their lethargy and self-centeredness, that will lead them to see facts as they really are, and to take their part in rebuilding a broken and disordered and a sorely stricken world.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the findings and recommendations of the Interstate Unemployment Insurance Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From The New York Times, Monday, February 15, 1932]

TEXT OF INTERSTATE UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE REPORT

ALBANY, N. Y., February 14.—The text of the report of the Interstate Commission on Unemployment Insurance is as follows:

"The Interstate Commission on Unemployment Insurance, composed of the representatives of the Governors of the States of New York, Ohio, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Connecticut, has the honor of presenting the following report of its findings and recommendations. Mr. Daniel F. McLaughlin, appointed by the Governor of Rhode Island as his representative, did not attend the meetings of the commission.

"At its first meeting in New York in the spring of 1931 the commission designated various of its members to inquire into the experience with voluntary and compulsory insurance in the United States and in Europe; to examine the administrative problems of compulsory insurance in this country; to appraise the many forms of State, Federal, and private unemployment insurance plans currently proposed in the United States; to inquire into the possibilities and problems of estimating the cost of different types of unemployment insurance; and to formulate standard principles of unemployment insurance best calculated to satisfy the requirements of American industry and political organization.

"The subcommittees charged with these investigations pursued their inquiries through the summer and early fall of 1931, and kept in touch with one another through correspondence and informal conference. In November, 1931, the full committee met again in New York for the consideration of the reports of subcommittees and for making a preliminary draft of its final report.

The findings and recommendations here presented constitute the unanimous agreement of the members of the interstate commission. The representative of the Governor of Ohio signs this report with the reservations here included.

I. FINDINGS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

"We regard unemployment as it exists in the United States to-day as a many-sided problem. It seems to us unlikely that any single measure now adopted, without further experimentation and experience, can cope successfully with all forms of unemployment or with the total period of unemployment, or even with all of the unemployed. The most substantial progress in dealing with the total problem of unemployment consists, we believe, in making provision for the persistent unemployment and irregularity of operation which is so characteristic of American industry. By a general attack on the problem at this point it should prove possible to assess responsibility for avoidable irregularity and to afford ownership and management incentives for the regularization of production and, hence, the reduction of unemployment.

"This method of approach to the problem of unemployment would rapidly yield comprehensive data on the relation between the numbers of regular workingmen on the one hand and, on the other, of casuals and unemployables. With such information at hand the task of formulating a national unemployment program designed to meet the grave emergencies of prolonged depressions would become much more practicable than it is at the present time.

"As the first important step in creating constructive unemployment machinery we are strongly of the opinion that measures proposed should combine the greatest possible simplicity in principle and practice and should look forward to the progressive stabilization of conditions of employment. With this goal in mind we therefore recommend:

"1. The compulsory establishment of state-wide systems of unemployment reserves.

"We are not unmindful of the progress which individual firms and groups of employers have made in this country with plans of voluntary unemployment reserves. From their activities much has already been learned concerning the problems of unemployment compensation in American industry. But, in spite of this encouraging advance, the fact remains that the total of voluntary unemployment insurance now in force in the United States affects only a small fraction of the work force of the Nation.

"It is our conviction that no substantial increase in the coverage of employees and that no widespread adoption of insurance by the most unstable of our industries can be expected in the predictable future unless the establishment of reserve funds is made obligatory through legislation.

"2. The payment by each employer of a contribution amounting to 2 per cent of his pay roll.

"We have canvassed carefully the arguments for and against the payment of contributions, or premiums, by employees; and we have in mind provisions for unemployment, in addition to those proposed here, which might well be financed in part by contributions from employees. But in view of the moderate terms of our proposal, the greatest share of the burden of unemployment would still be borne by the workers whose benefits under the plan would be considerably less than the wages he would have continued to receive if employed. The employee should not, in our judgment, be required to reduce his earnings further by the payment of contributions into unemployment reserves. A further important reason for not recommending contributions by the employees is that a purpose of our proposal is to encourage the adoption of measures of prevention.

"The employers' financial liability under our plan should operate as a continuous incentive to prevent unemployment so far as practicable. To reduce this liability, therefore, by placing part of the burden on his employees would likewise reduce the incentive to undertake preventive measures.

Payments by employers

"3. The payments made by each employer shall constitute the unemployment reserve of his firm and shall be so treated in the accounts.

"This proposal differs radically from the European plans of unemployment insurance in which contributions from all employers and all industries flow into a single common pool. It has been widely recognized even by sympathetic critics of European practice that the pooling of reserves has had unfortunate results. The irregular industries enabled to draw benefits for their unemployed workmen from the common pool may be thus tempted to shift the responsibility and cost of their own unemployment to the more stable and profitable industries.

"In so far, then, as unemployment is due to careless or indifferent management or to the failure to take proper precautions for the future, the pooling of reserves may have the effect of perpetuating such uneconomic practice and may, in consequence, fail to offer the incentives to regularization for which many of the advocates of unemployment insurance had hoped. Many of these difficulties may indeed be attacked by setting up industrial, in contrast to national, unemployment reserves and by adjusting the contributions of individual employers within each industry to their unemployment experience. While we recognize the merits of such a plan, in the interests of simplicity of administration and progress in stabilization, we propose that each company assume responsibility, limited by the amount of its contributions, for the unemployment of its own work force.

"4. The maximum rate of benefit shall be 50 per cent of an employee's wage, or $10 a week, whichever is lower; and the maximum period of benefit shall be 10 weeks within any 12 months. Employees who suffer unemployment by reason of short-time employment shall be eligible for benefits whenever their week's wages are less than 60 per cent of their average weekly wage, but the benefit for partial unemployment shall not exceed the difference between the wage actually received and 60 per cent of the employee's average weekly wage. In no case, however, shall the benefit of a part-time employee exceed $10 a week.

"5. The financial responsibility of an employer shall be strictly limited by the amount of his unemployment reserve.

"We regard this provision as a prerequisite to the sound development of any plan of compulsory unemployment insurance.

Failure to limit liability of the reserve funds is the first and most radical departure from accepted insurance principles and constitutes an open invitation to supplement contributed funds with subsidies from the Government or other sources. The adoption of such practices has been the rock on which foreign unemployment insurance schemes have split; and they have been responsible for the commingling of insurance and relief funds, which is now so universally deplored by all students of this problem.

"To safeguard the principle of limited liability we propose further that, when the employers' reserve at the beginning of any month is less than $50 per employee, the maximum rate of benefit be proportionately reduced.

Reserve limited

"6. When the accumulated reserve per employee shall exceed $50, the employer's contribution shall be reduced to 1 per cent of his pay roll; and when the reserve has reached $75, he shall make no further contributions to the fund until the reserve again falls below $75 per employee.

"The purpose of this provision is to offer employers effective incentives for the exercise of control over fluctuations in employment. We have considered the advisability of providing for a system of experience rating whereby the contributions of employers would from time to time be adjusted to their actual unemployment experience.

"The immediate adoption of experience rating we regard as premature. Moderate and experimental incentives to regularization are afforded in our proposal to reduce the premium when the reserve per employee exceeds $50. With the accumulation of experience and much more accurate data on unemployment rates than we now have, it should prove possible to use merit rating and refined methods of adjusting premiums to unemployment rates.

"To further encourage experiments with the prevention and reduction of unemployment, we recommend exemption of firms or groups of firms which have set up reserve funds providing benefits equal to or greater than those enumerated in the foregoing proposals.

"7. The State shall act as the custodian, investor, and disbursing agent of the reserve funds.

"For this purpose there should either be created an unemployment commission of three members, representing labor, industry, and the public, charged with establishing the system of unemployment reserves and with its continuing administration; or, where there already exists a State industrial commission similarly constituted, it should administer the unemployment compensation plan. The cost of administering the plan should, we believe, be assumed by the State. Expenses of the States would not be increased by the total cost of administration since the unemployment administration would take over functions now performed by existing agencies.

"The cost, in particular, of collecting and publishing employment and other industrial statistics, and of administering the public employment offices is not additional, since it is now incurred by existing State agencies.

State service extension asked

"8. The State shall take prompt steps to extend its public employment service.

"No system of unemployment insurance can accomplish its purposes without a properly organized and efficiently operated system of employment exchanges. The States represented on this commission now have public employment offices. We recommend that the existing employment bureaus be put under the jurisdiction of the employment administration. In order, however, that the work of the employment exchanges be not hampered and the staff burdened with duties growing out of the payment of unemployment benefits, it is important that the employment exchanges be operated as a separate division coordinate with a division of insurance.

"All of the staff of the employment bureaus should be under the classified civil service, with tenure not subject to political changes. Trade associations administering the unemployment reserves for their industries and organizations of employers and employees who maintain and operate approved unemployment insurance plans by collective agreements may operate their own employment bureaus and offices for the payment of benefits. Such industry offices must be under the general supervision of the State employment service and subject to its general rules.

"9. The unemployment authority shall create stabilization agencies.

"The most effective measures for achieving greater stabilization of employment can not obviously be accomplished by a single firm. Every effort should, therefore, be made by the unemployment administration to encourage cooperative action between firms and industries. To this end the unemployment administration should set up advisory committees of employers and employees and should have experts instructed to formulate plans to promote the regularization of employment in individual plants, localities, industries, and the State.

II

"The recommendations we have made constitute the principles on which, in our judgment, the features of a sound State unemployment compensation act should rest. The drafting of a model act we have regarded as beyond our province, since the specific acts proposed in several States may differ widely in detail, while adhering to the same underlying principles. In general, we urge the application of unemployment compensation to the largest possible number of employees, exclusive of agriculture and employees normally earning more than $200 a month. Efforts to regularize the employment of labor in small establishments are so important that we recommend including under the terms of the act all employers of six or more workers.

"We have not attempted to summarize in this report the great literature which has grown up on European and American experience with many types of unemployment insurance and reserves. Useful summaries, descriptive and critical, are now readily available in this country for students of the problem and for all other interested persons. The well-known difficulties of insolvency and abandonment of basic contractual insurance obligations which the European and some American schemes have encountered, particularly in the postwar phase of their history, have received our close attention and have been an important factor in directing our search for proper principles of unemployment compensation. We have been much influenced in our thinking by the profound and constructive interest among American business men in problems of stabilization and in forms of unemployment compensation which combine relief with incentives to prevention.

"We are conscious of the fact that our proposals are extremely modest and moderate. It is not, in our judgment, sound to impose an onerous burden of cost on American industry. The measures adopted now can, we recognize, only incidentally serve to mitigate the effects of severe and prolonged industrial depression. It may well be that the unemployment of long depressions can be met only by the creation of extraordinary reserve funds raised from contributions by employers, labor, and the Federal Government. We are clear, however, that the type of measures we propose constitute a constructive attack on the problem.

Simple system advocated

"Dealing with the chronic irregularity and unemployment of our industry will not only ameliorate the lot of the unemployed but will also, in time, point the way to further devices for strengthening the available machinery of unemployment relief and prevention. At the best, there will for some time remain a residuum of unemployed who must continue to look for assistance to the agencies of private and public charity. With the establishment and extension of unemployment compensation plans, however, we should be taking the first steps in reducing the wastes and damage to self-respect which characterize our present disorderly methods of handling the unemployed; and we should have put ourselves in the position of applying more scientific methods to the treatment of the total problem of unemployment.

"Our subcommittee on the cost of unemployment insurance investigated the possible costs of various types of such insurance. It found that available unemployment data, particularly with reference to the frequency and duration of spells of unemployment, were so unsatisfactory that estimates of cost were virtually useless. With compensable unemployment strictly defined and circumscribed, as it is in the provisions submitted in this report, it is possible to estimate that the cost of unemployment compensation should not exceed 2 per cent of the pay roll.

"We have finally explored the suggestion that there be created an interstate unemployment authority charged with setting up an interstate administration of unemployment compensation. It is our reasoned judgment on this matter that the best combined and separate interests of the States, participating in this inquiry, will be served by recommending to them the adoption of a practicable and simple type of unemployment compensation, whose cost should not seriously disturb the prevailing competitive relationship of industries doing business within the boundaries of those States.

"The adoption by the six States of a system of unemployment reserves, similar to the plan here proposed, would constitute a great step forward in the joint consideration and handling of interstate industrial problems. The pressing need for an intelligent unemployment program, revealed once more by our experience during the past two years, should hasten the favorable consideration of a moderate and practicable proposal for constructive experiment.

RESERVATIONS BY W. M. LOISERSON

The representative of the Governor of Ohio has signed this report; but he takes exception to any implications in it that an insurance system with pooling of contributions may not be better than a plan of separate plant reserves. In addition to the recommendations here contained he would recommend experiments with State unemployment insurance funds that included contributions from employees as well as from employers, and that pooled all the reserves after the manner of workmen's compensation insurance.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will report the first bill on the calendar.

HOWARD P. CORNICK

The first business on the calendar was the bill (S. 1951) for the relief of Howard P. Cornick.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the illness of the junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE], I ask unanimous consent that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

POST-OFFICE GARAGE LEASE, BOSTON, MASS.

The bill (S. 88) to authorize the Postmaster General to investigate the conditions of the lease of the post-office garage in Boston, Mass., and to readjust the terms thereof, was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the author of this bill is absent. I suggest that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

AMENDMENT OF IMMIGRATION ACT OF 1924

The bill (S. 268) to amend subdivision (c) of section 4 of the immigration act of 1924, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I make the same objection with regard to that bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I also add that in view of the illness of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] and his inability up to the present time to present a report on the bill, which he has agreed to do, the bill may go over until the report is presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

UNSOLICITED MERCHANDISE IN THE MAILS

The bill (S. 1663) to prohibit the sending of unsolicited merchandise through the mails was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have received a number of communications relating to this bill. I believe I shall ask that it go over for the present.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I may state to the minority leader that an identical bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, and this bill has been favorably recommended by the Postmaster General. It is designed to end a business practice which makes use of the United States mails throughout the country to the great annoyance of many people.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I recall distinctly the case of a manufacturer and seller of cards, who states that for many years it has been the practice in his business to forward the products to the prospective purchaser subject to approval. He claims that the enactment of this measure would destroy his business, and that there has never been any complaint respecting the method in which he has carried on his business.

Mr. HAYDEN. If he sends his merchandise to a list of customers who have ordered the same from him, there could be no objection on the part of those receiving the goods; but if he sends cards to people who have not asked that it be done the result is an annoyance which should be prohibited.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I would point out to the Senator that such cases would fall within the term "unsolicited merchandise." I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 209) granting an increase of pension to Mary Willoughby Osterhaus was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. KING. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2642) to establish a commission to be known as a commission on a national museum of engineering and industry was announced as next in order.

Mr. COPELAND. I suggest that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 6662) to amend the tariff act of 1930, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2915) authorizing A. A. Lilly, M. B. Collinsworth, and A. E. Booth, their heirs, legal representatives, and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Big Sandy River at or near where it enters into the Ohio River, and between the cities of Kenova, W. Va., and Catlettsburg, Ky., was announced as next in order.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

REORGANIZATION OF EXECUTIVE AGENCIES

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) authorizing the President to reorganize the executive agencies of the Government was announced as next in order.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Over.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I realize that the joint resolution is a matter of too much importance to justify taking it up and having it considered at this time. I rose to call attention to the fact, however, that the President's special message of this morning is, as it seems to me, in harmony with the provisions of the joint resolution. The President does not specifically recommend, of course, that authority be given to him as Chief Executive to consolidate the various executive agencies of the executive departments of the Government or agencies outside of the executive department, but he does suggest that the authority be vested somewhere.

I want to take this occasion to emphasize the thought, and I believe it to be a fact, that if any progress is ever made in the consolidation of boards, bureaus, commissions, agencies, and services, or in the elimination of unnecessary boards, bureaus, agencies, and services, it must be done by vesting authority in some one who can act. I know of no one who is better qualified to act than the President of the United States at any time.

At an appropriate time I expect to move to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution. I do not do so now, because I realize it is a measure of too much importance to be taken up under the rule under which we are proceeding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think before the Senator became a Member of this body a bill was introduced by former Senator Overman, of North Carolina, during the war, in 1917 or 1918, to give the President similar power. It was really introduced as a war measure. Under the terms of that bill it was limited to the duration of the war and for a period of something like 12 months thereafter, if I remember rightly. After its introduction that bill was very thoroughly discussed time after time. There was a great deal of opposition to it, and yet it was passed, but no steps were taken under it—that is, no steps of any great moment—to accomplish the purpose it had. The Senator will recall that a scandal grew out of conditions existing at that time. I think the only change which was made was a change in one of the functions of the Navy Department and in one of the functions of the Department of the Interior.

Instead of giving this blanket authority to the President, there ought to be a report from the President indicating beforehand what he is going to do and what changes he proposes. I did not hear the reading of all of the President's message this morning, but I am glad the Senator is going to let the measure go over, so we can consider what the President has said to-day and then consider the entire matter at length when it comes before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. Let us have the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order has been demanded, and the joint resolution goes over under objection.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course any Senator can call for the regular order and for the moment prevent discussion of this subject, but when the next order of business on the calendar is called a Senator can take the floor and speak for five minutes; so I am going to speak now, unless some Senator does insist on the regular order, in which event I shall wait until the next order of business on the calendar is called and then take the floor or make a motion to proceed to the consideration of the measure which is then called. I do not think there is any great hurry to get through with the calendar this morning.

Mr. President, I wish to invite the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to a concurrent resolution which was introduced by me in the Senate on February 5. The concurrent resolution is still on the table. It will probably be referred to a committee, since I do not think it competent to take action on it before it is considered by a standing committee of the Senate.

My thought in this connection is that the Government is getting too large, that we are constantly creating bureaus, agencies, offices, commissions, and boards, and that if we are ever to balance the Budget we must not only move in the direction of increased revenues but we must also move in the opposite direction of decreased expenditures. With that in mind, I framed the concurrent resolution and introduced it on the 5th of February providing for a joint commission of the Congress, consisting of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House, to inquire into "the best and most practicable means and methods of reducing governmental expenditures and to ascertain and report to the Congress what offices, agencies, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the National Government may be reduced, consolidated, or abolished without substantial detriment to the public interest." The remainder of the concurrent resolution relates to the procedure of the joint commission and authorizes a limited appropriation for its use in making the inquiry called for.

My suggestion at this time is that the Senator from Georgia consider the concurrent resolution in connection with his joint resolution with the view, if he so desires, of incorporating the proposal to abolish existing governmental agencies where it can be done.

Let me say, and then I shall not longer detain the Senate, that this is a very important matter. It will be quite difficult—it is always difficult—to abolish an office after it is once established. It is always difficult and it will continue to be difficult to abolish a board or commission or any other agency that draws salaries from the Public Treasury.

The mere consolidation of bureaus and the creation of new agencies is not going to work the reform that is absolutely necessary. While I did not have the opportunity of following the President's message as it was read to the Senate this morning, it impressed me that he proposes the creation of a large number of new bureaus or new bureau heads and new departmental chiefs. If we are not careful, and follow that method, we will be moving in the direction of still further enlarging the Federal Government, increasing Federal offices, and multiplying Federal agencies, and no one can tell where the process will lead us.

I am not blaming any person or any political party especially for the course that has been taken heretofore. It has been due to a combination of efforts on the part of everyone in public life to bring every activity of government to the National Capital, to concentrate here all sorts of enterprises that might very well and much better be carried on through local agencies.

I must admit that the undertaking to abolish unnecessary bureaus and governmental agencies, consolidating those that are capable of being consolidated, and reducing the number of commissions, boards, and departmental staffs is a very difficult task, but I do think that it is at least worthy of consideration.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I want again to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and also of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] who a few moments ago asked for the regular order to the joint resolution. There is no more important measure before the Congress, in my judgment, than the one which has been reported by the Senator from Georgia. On yesterday I offered in lieu of the joint resolution the following:

> The President is hereby authorized during the session or the recess of the Congress to take action looking to a proper and scientific coordination of the work of the various executive departments of the Government, and he is hereby requested to report upon the question of transfer and consolidation of commissions, bureaus, divisions, offices, and other governmental activities, in order that duplication of service may be abolished and extravagance and unnecessary expenditures eliminated, and report with recommendations; and the report and recommendations shall be made to Congress on the first day of the regular session thereof, the first Monday in December, 1932.

At that time I did not have before me the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Arkansas. I have just read it this morning. I believe that the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Arkansas should be adopted. That is the only logical way to deal with the subject. However, I think perhaps an amendment incorporating language somewhat like that I have just read might be added so as to enable us to have the combined wisdom of the commission and the President's information and suggestions on the same subject. I hope the Senator from Georgia will seriously consider the concurrent resolution of the Senator from Arkansas because I can not conceive of a better way to dispose of this matter than through the means suggested by that resolution.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senate. I have already said that I would not insist on a consideration of the matter at this time. But let me remind the Senators from Arkansas and Tennessee that a joint commission has heretofore been appointed for this particular purpose. It did considerable and very valuable work. I believe the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was chairman of that joint committee. Its report was filed, but nothing came of it.

If we are going to do any more than pay lip service to economy, in so far as it may be effected by the consolidation and simplication of government, we must vest the power and authority to act in some one, and who better than the Chief Executive when we are dealing with the executive offices? We may restrict his power as much as we please and limit it as much as we please. The resolution which I have offered gives the Congress 60 days after the filing of the report by the President abolishing an executive agency or service within which to disapprove the order.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. Further safeguards could be made, but I am quite confident that if we expect to make any progress—I do not want to argue the merits of it—we must approach the subject as a practical one. We must recognize that the power and influence of such a large number of bureaus, boards, and commissions as have developed here in Washington will always be sufficient to delay if not to block any remedial legislation by the Congress. We must place the power in somebody and give him the authority at least to take the initial steps.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If the Senator from Georgia will yield to me, I desire to call his attention to the fact that the objection he raised to the joint commission and the statement he makes that the joint commission heretofore did nothing——

Mr. GEORGE. No; I did not say that.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Or substantially nothing, applies with equal force to the very measure he now seeks to enact, for the reason that full powers were given the President in the law of 1917, but the President never acted upon them at all except, as I recall, in but one particular, and in that particular we all know the dire result that followed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, of course, the President of the United States might not act, but this morning he has submitted to the Congress a special message in which he himself called attention to the necessity for some move along this line. He does not say, of course, that he desires to have the responsibility placed upon him, but he does suggest that the responsibility must be placed somewhere ultimately if action is to be secured. I did not mean to say, and I hope the Senator from Tennessee did not understand me to say, that the prior joint commission did not do very valuable work and that there is not essential merit in the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas in his resolution. What I meant to say was that after the joint commission had done very valuable work the Congress did nothing about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in addition to what the Senator from Georgia has said, I desire to say that I think I spent more time upon the work of that commission, as its chairman, than upon any piece of legislation that has ever been presented to this body; and I think if the recommendations that were made at that time had been put into operation, and the consolidations made as recommended, there would have been tens and, indeed, hundreds of millions of dollars saved between that time and now, and there is just as much necessity, if not more, for legislation along that line now as there was years and years ago.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah when that report was made?

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was made in 1913, but I am not sure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I presume that many of the recommendations of the commission would now be obsolete or would require revision?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; I have no doubt of that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That was my thought in presenting this resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. The recommendations then submitted would not now apply altogether, because since then bureau after bureau and division after division have been created in the departments of the Government, until they have become so numerous that it seems to me there has got to be some action taken by Congress to provide a remedy. If we continue the policy that has been pursued in the past, the whole Government organization will become top-heavy and will cost the taxpayers of the country untold millions of dollars which actually could be saved.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We have created hundreds of boards, commissions, and Government offices since the report was made.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I have said.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Instead of reducing those agencies we have gone on with the same old process.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Howard Donovan, former consul at Bahia, Brazil, the sum of $500 in full settlement of all claims against the Government for the cost of embalming the body of his wife, Ruth Curtiss Donovan, buried, and subsequent transportation of the body from Bahia, Brazil, to its burial place at New Haven, Conn.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2570) authorizing adjustment of the claim of Joseph E. Bourrie Co. was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Over.

OWNERS OF SCHOONER "OAKWOODS" AND ITS CARGO

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 487) for the relief of Herbert G. Black, owner of the schooner Oakwoods, and Clark Coal Co., owner of the cargo of coal on board said schooner, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claims of Herbert G. Black, owner of the schooner Oakwoods, and Clark Coal Co., owner of the cargo of coal on board said schooner, for damages arising out of a collision between such schooner and the United States submarine R–3 off the southern end of Cape Cod Canal, on November 24, 1919, may be sued for by the said owners in the United States District Court for the District of Maine, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages, and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of the owner of the said schooner Oakwoods, and the owner of the cargo of coal on board said schooner, or against the owner of the said schooner Oakwoods, and the owner of the cargo of coal on board said schooner, in favor of the United States upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties and with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to know whether the committee received any evidence indicating culpability on the part of the representative of the Government? We have had a number of these cases referred to the proper courts for adjudication when, in my opinion, there was not a prima facie case made and not sufficient evidence adduced to justify putting the Government to the expense of defending an action.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, in this case there was in 1924 an original report from the Navy Department following an investigation by a naval board of inquiry. At that time the Navy Department held that there was no fault upon the part of the naval vessel, but that there was negligence upon the part of the schooner, and it recommended adversely on the bill then pending. It appeared, when the present bill was introduced, that the original investigation by the Navy Department was an ex parte investigation; that the board heard only the naval officers who were upon the submarine. The present report from the Navy Department admits the ex parte character of the original investigation and sends the findings here with no recommendation whatsoever.

It appears that, if the claimant were permitted to go into court and testify, he would give evidence that he was observing in all respects the rules of the road in the navigation of his vessel; that his lights were newly bought and placed in position by the captain himself, and that they met in all respects the requirements of the navigation rules. It is represented further that he would testify that the lights of the submarine were themselves deficient and that there was no bow watch on the submarine.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WHITE. Yes.

Mr. KING. I do not ask the Senator to go into the case and state the testimony; I only ask whether or not before the committee there was evidence tending to show culpability upon the part of the representatives of the Government? Was there anything tending to show that there was negligence on the part of the officers of the Government?

Mr. WHITE. There was the direct statement presented that if permitted to go into court the claimant would testify that there was negligence on the part of the Government officers because of the absence of any bow watch on the submarine, and that the testimony would be that the failure to have such a bow watch was a direct and chief contributing cause to the collision.

Mr. KING. May I ask the Senator whether that was hearsay or whether the claimant himself appeared before the committee?

Mr. WHITE. Counsel for the claimants stated in writing that if permitted to testify the captain of the schooner would testify to that effect.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH J. BAYLIN

The bill (S. 1021) for the relief of Joseph J. Baylin was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Joseph J. Baylin, of Baltimore, Md., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,000, which sum was forfeited to the United States by Joseph J. Baylin on the bail bond of Berkely Morseberger, afterwards produced in court through the efforts of said Joseph J. Baylin.

PETROLIA-FORT WORTH GAS-PIPE LINE

The bill (S. 2307) to provide for the settlement of damage arising from the construction of the Petrolia-Fort Worth gas-pipe line was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that the bill go over.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I say a word about this bill?

Mr. KING. I withhold my objection.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, this is a bill to pay damages appraised and found to be due by a representative of the Navy Department to landowners for injuries to crops, lands, and fences occasioned by the construction of the Government-owned helium-gas pipe line from wells in north Texas to the Government helium plant at Forth Worth, Tex., in 1918 and 1919. Most of the damage claims have been settled, and this bill is to pay the remainder of unsettled claims in accordance with the findings of the Navy Department. The sum involved amounts to about $7,000 in all.

Mr. KING. My recollection is that many years ago, following the war, within a limited period persons who had claims growing out of the activities of the Government during the war were authorized to present those claims to a commission which was set up, and that commission, as I recall, had funds with which to meet such adjudicated claims. Was this claim presented to that commission?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The commission had no jurisdiction over claims of this character. No commission was set up to pass on these claims. The Navy Department itself examined the claims and found certain amounts to be due.

Mr. KING. Why should not this claim go to the Court of Claims? Why take merely the statement of the department? I do not think we have been in the habit of doing that except in cases where very small amounts were involved.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Most of the claims have been paid. A few remain unsettled because of continued failure to agree with the claimants. An appropriation made heretofore covering all the claims lapsed before all the disputed ones were settled. These are not such claims as go before the Court of Claims.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me there?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does this claim grow out of the war or did it grow out of occurrences that transpired after the close of the war? I understand some of the helium plants had been established since the war. If so, the claim involved in the bill now before the Senate might not have come under the jurisdiction of the commission to which reference has been made.

Mr. KING. I should like to ascertain by what authority the Navy Department or some naval officer went out and made an investigation, and by what authority he was required to report to Congress his findings. If it was just a voluntary act upon the part of some official of the Navy Department, it seems to me that the claim ought to go to the Court of Claims, rather than that Congress should take the findings and pay the amount which he recommended.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, my experience and observation have been that when either Naval or Army officers are willing to admit that any of them have done any damage to any private person the chances are they have done it.

Mr. KING. That may be, but yet that would not be justification for the payment without the proper machinery of the Government or of the courts being employed for the purpose of determining the liability and the amount which should be paid.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The legal course was followed in this matter. The construction of the helium-gas pipe line was a war measure. It had to be constructed; and the department in charge, the Navy Department, went across people's lands in some instances without getting their permission, before it could reach a satisfactory arrangement with them, the understanding being that damage claims were to be adjusted afterwards. Adjustments were made under existing law, and an appropriation was made to pay all claims of this character after findings by the proper officer of the Navy Department. The appropriation lapsed before all the claims were settled. The pending bill takes care of claims still unpaid.

Mr. SMOOT. And it was under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department when the damages occurred.

Mr. SHEPPARD. So it was.

Mr. KING. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to transmit to the General Accounting Office for payment, in accordance with the approved findings contained in the report rendered by Lieut. Ira P. Griffin, Civil Engineer Corps, United States Navy, to the Navy Department under date of July 29, 1921, all unpaid claims for rights of way and damages to private property sustained in connection with the construction on behalf of the United States during the years 1918 and 1919, of a gas-pipe line extending from Petrolia to Fort Worth, Tex.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy is also authorized to transmit to the General Accounting Office for payment the claim of W. S. Wakeman in the sum of $65 in addition to the sum for said claimant approved in the above-mentioned report.

SEC. 3. That acceptance by any claimant of an amount offered for settlement pursuant to this act shall be deemed to be in full settlement of his claim against the United States.

SEC. 4. No payment shall be made to any claimant under the provisions of this act who has received satisfaction from any other source for the damages sustained due to the laying of said gas-pipe line.

SEC. 5. That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of this act, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $7,356.75.

AMENDMENT OF RIVERS AND HARBORS ACT OF JULY 3, 1930

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 93) amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). This joint resolution is the same as House Joint Resolution 271.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent to substitute the House joint resolution for the Senate joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator if the House measure is exactly the same as the Senate measure?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. They are identical.

The Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 271) amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the provision, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis, in section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"Mississippi River between mouth of Illinois River and Minneapolis: The existing project is hereby modified so as to provide a channel depth of 9 feet at low water with widths suitable for long-haul common-carrier service, to be prosecuted in accordance with the plan for a comprehensive project to procure a channel of 9-foot depth, submitted in House Document No. 290, Seventy-first Congress, second session, or such modification thereof as in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers may be advisable; and the sum of $7,500,000, in addition to the amounts authorized under existing projects, is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the prosecution of initial works under the modified project: Provided, That all locks below the Twin City Dam shall be of not less than the Ohio River standard dimensions."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota permit me to inquire why this matter was not brought in under the rivers and harbors bill, or is not included with the appropriations which are made in pursuance of it?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. This is not an appropriation. The only new legislation in this amendment is the words "or such modification thereof as in the discretion of the Chief of Engineers may be advisable." That is usually put in rivers and harbors acts authorizing the construction of public works. In the act that was passed in 1930 these words were not included; and the engineers want them there in order to give them certain discretion which they have not at present.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The bill is intended to correct an error in the act of 1930, according to the report.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Yes; that is all.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate Joint Resolution 93 will be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an explanatory statement by the engineers in reference to the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The specific purpose of the resolution is to enable the engineers to take advantage of their later surveys detailed in their final report submitted at this session in House Document No. 137, and to conform their tentative plans, as far as appropriations will permit, to their findings and conclusions as expressed in that final report.

RESIDENCE UPON HOMESTEAD LANDS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 268) to excuse certain persons from residence upon homestead lands during 1930 and 1931 in the drought-stricken areas, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys, with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 4, after the word "calendar," to strike out "years 1930 and" and insert "year 1929, 1930, or"; in line 5, after the word "it," to strike out "necessary" and insert "necessary, or during 1932 should find it necessary"; in line 8, after the word "family," to strike out "and" and insert "or"; in line 10, after the word "register," to insert "of the district"; and on page 2, line 2, after the word "years," to strike out "1930 and 1931" and insert "1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any homestead settler or entryman who, during the calendar year 1929, 1930, or 1931, found it necessary, or during 1932 should find it necessary, to leave his homestead to seek employment in order to obtain food and other necessaries of life for himself, family, or work stock because of serious drought conditions, causing total or partial failure of crops, may, upon filing with the register of the district proof of such conditions in the form of a corroborated affidavit, be excused from residence upon his homestead during all or part of the calendar years 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, and said entries shall not be open to contest or protest because of such absences: Provided, That the time of such actual absence shall not be deducted from the actual residence required by law, but an equivalent period shall be added to the statutory life of the entry.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not quite understand the bill. What is the point in the bill? I did not quite catch it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the bill is intended to excuse homesteaders from residence upon their lands in the drought-stricken regions of the country where they were unable to continue their residence upon the lands by reason of failure of crops during those three years, and provides that their entries shall not be subject to contest by reason of their absence if their absence was occasioned in that way. The department has said that they are already protected by a general act, but it is rather too general; and it was thought that it would be safer to make this specific provision.

Mr. GORE. Was there a drought in 1929?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There was; yes.

Mr. GORE. I gather that the bill, as originally introduced, did not include 1929.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is quite correct. In certain sections of the Northwest the drought has existed for three years, unfortunately.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, does the Senator think it is necessary to include 1932? There will be no drought this year. We have more water there now than we can take care of.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but the trouble about that is that by reason of the drought of 1931 it becomes necessary for the homesteaders to leave their homesteads now and go somewhere else to seek employment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true as to 1931; but they have the whole of 1932 now to go back on their homesteads. There could not be any drought in 1932, because everybody in the West that I know of says we are going to have more water than we have had for years and years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wish that were true in Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought it was.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that does not affect the situation, because, however that may be, having no resources acquired by reason of the failure of crops in 1931, they will not be able to maintain their residence on the homesteads during 1932.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no particular objection to it; but I thought the question of drought would not be involved in the year 1932.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was not intended to excuse them by reason of drought in 1932; but it was intended to excuse them from residence on their homesteads in 1932 by reason of the drought in 1931, which compels them this season to go elsewhere to find a livelihood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah object?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Montana a question. I assume that this amendatory act contemplates the case where there has been an abandonment and no actual possession maintained of the property.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Where a residence had been established, but it was found impossible to continue it as provided by the rule. The rule of the department requires a continuous residence.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; I understand that; and I presume the Senator has given consideration to some possible adverse entry and actual possession.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, no; there could be no adverse possession. In order for one to secure any right, he must institute before the Land Office a contest against the entryman, and secure a cancellation of his entry by reason of his failure to reside upon the land.

Mr. GEORGE. So that there could be no adverse actual possession during the period covered by this amendatory act?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There could be none.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to excuse certain persons from residence upon homestead lands during 1929, 1930, 1931, and 1932, in the drought-stricken areas."

LANDS IN HARFORD COUNTY, MD.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 567) to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, on page 1, line 5, after the word "to," to strike out "the" and insert "The"; on page 2, line 7, after the word "said," to strike out "the" and insert "The"; and in line 14, after the words "expense of," to strike out "the" and insert "The," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell, upon such terms and conditions as he considers advisable, to The Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., or its nominee, certain tracts of land adjacent to the right of way of said railroad company, situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland between Aberdeen and Magnolia stations of said railroad company, such tracts containing approximately 6 acres, more or less, and now forming parts of War Department reservations at Aberdeen Proving Ground, Edgewood Arsenal, and Fort Hoyle, which said tracts are no longer needed for military purposes, and to execute and deliver in the name of the United States and in its behalf with and to the said The Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co., or its nominee, any and all contracts, conveyances, or other instruments necessary to effectuate such sale; the net proceeds of the sale of the property hereinbefore designated to be deposited in the Treasury to the credit of the fund known as the Military Post Construction Fund: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall have the tracts of land appraised at the expense of The Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co.: And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall not sell the tracts of land for less consideration than the approved appraised value thereof.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to The Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland."

NATIONAL MASONIC MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 499) authorizing the erection by the National Masonic Memorial Association of a memorial building at Fort Benning, Ga., which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 4, after the word "available," to insert "to any denomination," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the National Masonic Memorial Association, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Georgia, is authorized to erect, in and upon the United States military reservation at Fort Benning, Ga., a suitable building in memory of those American men who have given their lives for their country, and to maintain and use such memorial building for the purposes of the association, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe, the plans and site of such building to be first approved by the Secretary of War. A portion of such memorial building shall be designed and used as a post chapel, without expense to the Government, and shall be available to any denomination for public worship. The United States shall be put to no expense in connection with the erection, maintenance, or use of such building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARE AND TREATMENT OF MEMBERS OF NATIONAL GUARD, ETC.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1690) to make provision for the care and treatment of members of the National Guard, Organized Reserves, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and citizens' military training camps who are injured or contract disease while engaged in military training, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, to insert at the end of the bill the following proviso:

Provided further, That, except as herein provided, section 6 of the act of March 4, 1923, as amended by the act of April 26, 1928 (45 Stat. 461), is hereby repealed.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That persons of the classes hereinafter enumerated who, while in a status hereinafter specified, suffer personal injury or, except as otherwise hereinafter prescribed, contract disease, not the result of their own misconduct, shall, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, be entitled, at Government expense, to: (1) Such hospitalization, rehospitalization, medical and surgical care in hospitals and at their homes as is necessary for the appropriate treatment of such injury or disease, until the disability resulting therefrom can not be materially improved by further hospitalization or treatment; (2) continuation during periods of such hospitalization and rehospitalization, but not for more than an aggregate of six months in any case, of the pay and allowances, whether in money or kind, to which they were entitled at the time such injury was suffered or disease contracted, to be computed from the first day of hospitalization following the injury or contraction of disease and including all subsequent periods of hospitalization and travel between hospitals and their homes; (3) subsistence during any period of hospitalization or rehospitalization when not entitled to pay and allowances under the next preceding provision; (4) necessary transportation incident to such hospitalization and rehospitalization and return to their homes upon discharge therefrom.

The provisions of this act shall be applicable to (1) members of the National Guard while en route to or from or during the period of attendance at encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, or service schools, under the provisions of sections 94, 97, or 99 of the national defense act of June 3, 1916, as amended, or (in case of personal injury only, as distinguished from disease) while participating in aerial flights prescribed under the provisions of section 92 of said national defense act, as amended; (2) members of the Officers' Reserve Corps and Enlisted Reserve Corps of the Army while on active duty under proper orders, or (in case of personal injury only, as distinguished from disease) while voluntarily participating, when not on active duty, in aerial flights in Government-owned aircraft by proper authority as an incident to their military training; (3) members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and members of the citizens' military training camps while en route to or from, or during the period of attendance at, camps of instruction under the provisions of section 47a, or 47d of said national defense act, as amended.

In the event of the death, from any cause, of any person of the classes enumerated in the preceding paragraph while he is in any status described in that paragraph, or while he is undergoing the hospitalization, rehospitalization, or other medical care contemplated by this act, the United States shall, under such regulations as the President may prescribe, pay the necessary expenses, within a maximum to be prescribed by the President, for the recovery of his body, its preparation for burial, including the use of such of the uniform and articles of clothing issued to him as may be required, interment (or cremation if requested by his relatives), and transportation of his remains, including transportation and subsistence of an escort, to his home or such other place as his relatives may designate, provided the distance to such other place be not greater than the distance to his home: Provided, That when the expenses of the recovery, preparation, and disposition of remains herein authorized, or any part thereof, are paid by individuals, such individuals may be reimbursed therefor in such amount as authorized by the regulations herein provided for.

The determination of the fact whether an injury was suffered or disease contracted by the person concerned as a result of his own misconduct, and of all other facts and conditions necessary to entitle a person to the benefits of this act, shall be made by the Secretary of War under such regulations as the President may prescribe, and such determination shall be final and conclusive for all purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. That any person who, on the date of approval of this act, is receiving or entitled to receive hospitalization or medical treatment under the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 4, 1923, as amended, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act in lieu thereof: Provided, That existing appropriations for carrying out the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 4, 1923, as amended, shall be available for any expenditures authorized by this act: Provided further, That, except as herein provided, section 6 of the act of March 4, 1923, as amended by the act of April 26, 1928 (45 Stat. 461), is hereby repealed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to explain this bill, because it is not so formidable as it seems at first sight.

The bill has four purposes. First, the words "in line of duty" have been so strictly construed by the Comptroller General and other authorities here that we find that in some cases it is very difficult to give medical attention to a young man in one of these training camps where he is injured, not through any misconduct of his but merely in a period of relaxation between actual duty service in the camp. He ought, of course, to be taken to the hospital if he is injured through no misconduct of his; and this bill substitutes the one phrase for the other.

Next, the present law permits hospitalization with pay and allowances to anyone who is hurt in the course of an active training camp, but the Comptroller General has ruled that the period must be a continuous one; and where a doctor has been oversanguine in allowing the discharge of a patient and the patient has to come back 48 hours later for further medical care, the comptroller has ruled that the second period could not legally be granted by the Government. It is a very narrow point, and a very few dollars are involved. I do not suppose there are more than two or three such cases in a year. The limitation is very strict to six months' hospitalization in toto. This merely allows the six months to be taken in two or more installments, if necessary.

The third change is that the present law permits the medical care of members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps and members of the citizens' military training camps in case of accident occurring at the camp, but does not permit their care in case of disease. Of course, if a young man gets pneumonia in the course of his duty, he is just as much entitled to Government hospitalization for the short period involved as if he breaks his leg. Each is an accident. One is traumatic; the other is not. We have put them both on the same basis by this bill.

Furthermore, it is found that in some cases the allowance of $100 for burial expense is inadequate where the young man's home is a considerable distance from the camp. As the Senate knows, a ticket for a corpse costs as much as a ticket for a live man, and you can not furnish much of a funeral for $100 if you have to pay $25 or $30 out of it for railroad fare. This bill merely corrects that situation.

I do not believe the total cost to the Government would be increased more than a few hundred dollars by this legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one question. If the ailment results from the misconduct of the individual, is the Government then to assume the liability?

Mr. REED. The Government is not responsible in any way whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CARETAKERS FOR NATIONAL GUARD ORGANIZATIONS

The bill (S. 1692) to amend section 90 of the national defense act, as amended, relative to the employment of caretakers for National Guard organizations was considered by the Senate and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That that part of section 90 of the national defense act, as amended, following the word "Provided," be, and same is hereby, amended so as to read:

"That the caretakers hereby authorized to be employed shall not exceed 5 for any one organization, except heavier-than-air squadrons, for each of which a maximum of 10 is authorized, who shall be paid by the United States disbursing officer for each State, Territory, and the District of Columbia.

"The compensation paid to caretakers who belong to the National Guard, as herein authorized, shall be in addition to any compensation authorized for members of the National Guard under any of the provisions of the national defense act.

"Under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe, the matériel, animals, armament, and equipment, or any part thereof, of the National Guard of a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia may be put into a common pool for care, maintenance, and storage; and the employment of caretakers therefor, not to exceed 15 for any one pool, is hereby authorized.

"Commissioned officers on the active list of the National Guard shall not be employed as caretakers, except that one such officer not above the grade of first lieutenant for each heavier-than-air squadron may be employed. Either enlisted men or civilians may be employed as caretakers, but if there are as many as two caretakers in any organization one of them shall be an enlisted man.

"The Secretary of War shall, by regulations, fix the salaries of all caretakers hereby authorized to be employed and shall also designate by whom they shall be employed."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to save a little money for the Government. The present law seems to require a caretaker for each unit of the National Guard. This bill allows their valuable property to be pooled, under regulations, so that we may have one caretaker for the property of several units.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, is the Senator certain that this bill will save the Government money?

Mr. REED. The War Department is certain, and its report seems plausible.

Mr. GORE. Will it save very much?

Mr. REED. Not very much.

Mr. GORE. That is a step in a strange direction.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL CREDITS

The bill (S. 1567) establishing a revolving fund to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture for agricultural credit purposes was announced as next in order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, this bill involves so much that it hardly seems to me it ought to be passed under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I can not express to the Senate the necessity for speedy action in this matter. It involves the maintenance of rural credit associations. They are the banking facilities set up under the intermediate credit system to aid farmers in making crops by depositing certain collateral.

We found that of the sum appropriated last year $10,000,000 was used. The Government loses nothing by it, and this year it is imperative that the remaining $10,000,000 be made available if arrangements are to be made through these intermediate credit corporations for the production of this year's crop. I hope the Senator will allow this matter to be considered now and passed, as time is the real essence of the whole matter.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I very much hope we may have consideration of the bill, because we have heretofore had similar matters before the Congress and the subject matter is not new. Indeed, a similar act is now in force, but it is temporary and has been closed by Executive order, as I understand it.

This bill has been recommended not only by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, but a similar bill has been recommended by the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives and is now on the House Calendar.

The matter has had careful consideration. The real purpose of it is to advance or to provide the necessary capital to farmers who wish to organize livestock or credit corporations, so that they may then procure their own credits without the necessity of coming back to the Government for direct production loans.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill is probably entirely meritorious, but I notice it was introduced by the Senator from Georgia calling for $20,000,000, and the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in a 7-line report, cuts the sum down from $20,000,000 to $10,000,000.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me explain, please. I myself suggested the amendment, for the reason that $10,000,000 is now being used for this particular purpose by the Department of Agriculture under a previous act, but it is being used only under a temporary authority. It is not a permanent fund which the department may administer from year to year.

I believed it wise to bring the amount within the limitations of the prior appropriation. That amendment was made at my suggestion by the chairman of the committee.

I very much hope the Senator will allow the bill to pass. It will go to the House, anyway.

Mr. REED. I have just one further question. Is it sound policy to create these permanent revolving funds without any limitation of time whatever?

Mr. GEORGE. I was going to say to the Senator, if that thought was in his mind, and it is in the mind of the Senator from Utah, that we add at the end of the bill the words "until July 1, 1934." I think that would carry us beyond the period of necessity.

Mr. REED. If the Senator would offer that amendment, I would have no objection to the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. I offer to amend by striking out the period at the end of the bill and inserting a comma and the following words, "until July 1, 1934."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was, on page 1, line 3, after the word "hereby," to insert the words "authorized to be"; on line 5, to strike out "$20,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000,000"; and on page 2, line 15, after the word "thereof" and before the period, to insert the words "until July 1, 1934," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, to be immediately available and to constitute a permanent revolving fund, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture and to be known as the agricultural credit fund, for the purpose of making advances or loans to individuals for forming such local agricultural credit corporations, livestock loan companies, or like organizations as are now or may hereafter be qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks and of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, of making advances or loans direct to such corporations, companies, or organizations, upon such security as he may deem adequate. The advances and loans from the revolving fund shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe; except that the advances and loans to any such corporation, company, or organization outstanding at any time shall not exceed 50 per cent of the capital stock thereof. All amounts received upon the repayment of any advance or loan made pursuant to this act shall be paid into the revolving fund and shall become a part thereof until July 1, 1934.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to understand this bill and ascertain its commitments so far as the United States is concerned. May I say that measures of this kind, if I understand its terms, do not commend themselves to my judgment? I fear that it contravenes the accepted interpretation of the powers of the Federal Government. As I interpret it, it seems not to be sound philosophy, based upon our theory of government, for the Government of the United States to become a banking institution for all the industries of the United States, or to furnish capital to enable individuals or corporations to engage in the various forms of industry. We have gone a long way, it seems to me, in much of the legislation recently enacted.

A few years ago we set up a number of organizations to aid farmers. Boards and corporations were provided, from which loans could be obtained. This bill, as I understand it, seeks to create a revolving fund, from which loans will be made to individuals who may form organizations.

The cooperative societies which have been organized under the $500,000,000 appropriation recently made have borrowed enormous sums under that legislation. One company I have in mind obtained, as I recall, $20,000,000. I inquire why the organizations which the Senator from Georgia desires to be formed may not apply to the Farm Board and obtain loans from the $500,000,000 fund?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. The Farm Board has no authority to lend for the purposes here indicated. This is merely to advance the capital, on the approval of the Secretary, and with security, for the purpose of enabling the farmers to form, not cooperative organizations but livestock or credit corporations, through which they may deal with the intermediate credit banks. The farmer can not borrow directly from the intermediate credit banks. He may only borrow through his livestock corporation or credit association, or other like association. Such associations must have a paid-in capital.

Mr. KING. Does this bill contemplate that corporations will be formed under the laws of the various States, and that a part of their capital will be drawn from this $10,000,000 fund?

Mr. GEORGE. Provided the Secretary of Agriculture is willing to make the loans for that purpose, and the organizers can furnish the necessary security.

Mr. KING. Of course, under this principle, plumbers or druggists, or persons engaged in any other form of industry, could apply to the Government and, if the principle is to be extended, obtain funds with which to organize corporations throughout the United States in order to aid them to secure loans.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, we have not set up banks for that purpose, but we have set up an intermediate banking system. We have made it impossible for the farmer to go directly to that institution. He must go through these organizations. I am earnestly endeavoring to get away from the direct loan by the Government to the individual farmer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the amendment which the Senator just stated would be acceptable——

Mr. GEORGE. It has been adopted.

Mr. KING. At the end of 1934, then, will this $10,000,000 be restored to the Government?

Mr. GEORGE. It will be. I now ask that the word "permanent," wherever it appears as describing the revolving fund, be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that amendment will be made.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, just a question of the author of the bill. The bill provides for a finance agency to lend money to the Federal intermediate credit bank. Is it the thought that it should also do business with the Reconstruction Corporation?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to loan money to such an organization.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Does the Senator include under the provisions of the bill the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or does he limit it to the Federal intermediate credit bank?

Mr. GEORGE. That is a mere reference in describing the type or kind or character of organization—that is, such an organization as is authorized to do business with the intermediate credit bank. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to loan to such organizations.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORE. Let that go over for the present.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would not make that objection. This legislation has passed the Senate in the past, and it is greatly needed.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, as I gather from the title of the bill, it is to lend money to irrigation projects.

Mr. DILL. Yes; irrigation and drainage and all other projects of that kind throughout the country.

Mr. GORE. By the Government?

Mr. DILL. By the Government, on 40-year terms.

Mr. GORE. Let it be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco, at or near the general site from Rincon Hill, in the city and county of San Francisco, to and across Goat Island, in San Francisco Bay, thence to Oakland, in the county of Alameda, authorized to be built by the State of California, by an act of Congress approved February 20, 1931, are hereby extended two and seven years, respectively, from February 20, 1932.

CHANGE IN SPELLING OF PORTO RICO

Mr. DILL. Let that go over.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I ask what the objection is? The joint resolution was introduced at the request of the Legislature of Porto Rico.

Mr. DILL. Instead of making geography more difficult we ought to simplify it, and I think it is a ridiculous proposition to go back to an ancient spelling of the name.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

AMERICAN SAMOA GOVERNMENT

SEC. 45. That the District Court of the United States for the District of Hawaii shall have jurisdiction to review by appeal and thereupon to confirm, modify, or reverse final decisions of the high court of American Samoa in all cases, civil or criminal, wherein the provisions of this act or a statute or treaty of the United States, or any authority thereunder, is involved; in all other civil cases wherein the value in the controversy, exclusive of interests and costs, exceeds $2,000; in all other criminal cases where the offense charged is punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year or by death, and in all habeas corpus proceedings. That the said district court of the United States shall also have jurisdiction to review the interlocutory orders and decrees of the said high court, and also whenever any record on appeal is manifestly incomplete or insufficient for a satisfactory understanding of the appeal, to inquire further into the matters in controversy. That, in lieu of statutory requirements applicable elsewhere, the said district court of the United States shall provide by its rules the mode of appeals generally, and particularly taking into consideration informality of procedure in the courts of American Samoa, such rules to be approved by the Attorney General of the United States. That for the above purpose special terms of the said district court of the United States shall be held in American Samoa at such times and in such places as the judges thereof may deem expedient.

CHAPTER V—MISCELLANEOUS

SEC. 46. That until further provision is made by Congress the wharves and landings constructed or controlled by the Government of American Samoa on any seacoast, bay, roadstead, or harbor shall remain under the control of the government of American Samoa, which shall receive and enjoy all revenue derived therefrom on condition that said property shall be kept in good condition for the use and convenience of commerce, but no tolls or charges shall be made by the government of American Samoa for the use of any such property by the United States or by any vessel of war, tug, revenue cutter, or other boat or transport in the service of the United States.

SEC. 47. That except as otherwise provided, the public property ceded and transferred to the United States under the said cessions, shall be and remain in the possession, use, and control of the government of American Samoa, and shall be maintained, managed, and cared for by it, at its own expense, until otherwise provided for by Congress, or taken for the uses and purposes of the United States by direction of the President or the Governor of American Samoa. And any such public property so taken for the uses and purposes of the United States may be restored to its previous status by direction of the President. The President may, from time to time, in his discretion, convey to the people of American Samoa such lands, buildings, or interest in land or other property owned by the United States, and within the territorial limits of American Samoa, as in his opinion are no longer needed for the purposes of the United States.

SEC. 48. That the public lands of American Samoa shall not be sold. They shall be administered under such laws as the Fono shall enact: Provided, That all revenues from, or proceeds of the same, except as regards such part thereof as may be used or occupied for the civil, military, or naval purposes of the United States, or may be assigned for the use of the Government of American Samoa, shall be used solely for the benefit of the inhabitants of American Samoa for educational and other public purposes.

LAND

SEC. 49. That no person not a citizen of American Samoa shall acquire, by purchase or otherwise, title to land, nor any leasehold interest therein, for a term in excess of 20 years: Provided, however, That this prohibition shall not affect the vested rights of persons who, not being citizens of American Samoa or of organizations which were owners of land or held leasehold interests in excess of such term, on the taking effect of this act, nor shall it apply to the conveyance or transfer, approved by the governor, to an authorized recognized religious society of sufficient land for the erection thereon of a church or a dwelling house for the pastor, or both: And provided further, That this prohibition shall not apply to the Government either of American Samoa nor of the United States of America. Any transfers of interests in land in violation hereof shall be void.

SEC. 50. That the following officers shall receive the following annual salaries, to be paid by the United States: The governor, $10,000; the attorney general, $6,000; the chief justice, $6,000. The governor shall receive annually from the United States in addition to his salary the sum of $500 for stationery, postage, and incidentals; and his traveling expenses while absent from the capital on official business. The governor is authorized to employ a private secretary, who shall receive an annual salary of $2,400, and an interpreter, who shall receive an annual salary of $1,800, both to be paid by the United States. Said officers and said private secretary shall be entitled to transportation for themselves, their immediate families, and their household effects from their homes in the United States to American Samoa upon their appointment, and from American Samoa to their said homes upon completion of their duties. Each said officers and said private secretary shall be granted also a leave of absence, but not oftener than every other year, as may by the governor be arranged, during which he shall be entitled to an additional allowance of $500, to be paid by the United States.

QUARANTINE

SEC. 51. That quarantine stations shall be established at such places in American Samoa as the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service of the United States shall direct, and the quarantine regulations for American Samoa relating to the importation of diseases from other countries shall be under the control of the Government of the United States. The quarantine stations and grounds at the harbor of Pagopago, together with all the public property belonging to that service, shall be transferred to the Public Health Service of the United States, and said grounds shall continue to be so used and employed until the station is changed to other grounds which may be selected by order of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The health laws of the government of American Samoa relating to the harbor of Pagopago and other harbors and inlets from the sea, and to the internal control of the health of American Samoa, shall remain in the jurisdiction of the government of American Samoa, subject to the quarantine laws and regulations of the United States.

SEC. 52. That imports from American Samoa into any State or Territory of the United States, of any dutiable article not the growth, production, or manufacture of American Samoa and imported into American Samoa after February 20, 1929, shall pay the same duties that are imposed on the same articles when imported into the United States from any foreign country.

That merchandise and articles which are the growth, production, or manufacture of American Samoa coming into the United States from American Samoa shall be entered at the several ports of entry free of duty, and in no event shall any duties be collected on said merchandise or articles.

NATURALIZATION

SEC. 53. That for the purposes of naturalization under the laws of the United States residence in the islands of American Samoa prior to the taking effect of this act shall be deemed equivalent to residence in the United States, and the requirement of a previous declaration of intention to become a citizen of the United States and to renounce former allegiance shall not apply to persons who have resided in said islands at least five years prior to the taking effect of this act, but all other provisions of the laws of the United States relating to naturalization shall, so far as applicable, apply to persons in said islands: Provided, however, That no person of Polynesian blood shall be denied the benefit of said laws solely by the fact of such ancestry. The high court of American Samoa is hereby given jurisdiction in naturalization matters, subject to the right of appeal as in this act provided.

SEC. 54. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law; and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published from time to time.

SEC. 55. Swains Island shall be considered as part of the naval station of Tutuila, and the affairs of the inhabitants thereof shall be administered by the commandant of that station as nearly as practicable in accordance with the laws of American Samoa locally applicable. SEC. 57. This act may be cited as the "Samoan Organic Act."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, what is this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. This is the same bill which passed the Senate last year. It was prepared by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Are there any changes in it?

Mr. BINGHAM. No changes.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSFER OF LAVACA COUNTY, TEX., TO SOUTHERN DISTRICT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6304) to transfer Lavaca County from the Houston division of the southern judicial district of Texas, which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA WORKHOUSE ROADS

The bill (S. 1768) to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va., was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to convey to the State of Virginia, or to the county of Fairfax in said State, a strip of land 50 feet wide to be used as a public thoroughfare running southerly for a distance of approximately 1,700 feet from the Fairfax Courthouse Road to the Telegraph Road in Fairfax County, Va., as shown on map No. 1595, filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia: Provided, That the State of Virginia, or the county of Fairfax in said State, shall convey to the District of Columbia for private use as part of the workhouse property a portion of Telegraph Road running southwesterly for a distance of approximately 900 feet from the Fairfax Courthouse Road to the 50-foot strip herein authorized to be conveyed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as shown on map No. 1595, filed in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia.

LOANS TO FARMERS FOR THE CROP OF 1931

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2265) to extend the time for repayment of certain loans to farmers for the crop of 1931.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I do not wish to object to the present consideration of this bill, but I do wish to submit an amendment.

The bill proposes to grant an extension of the seed loans made one year ago. It provides for an extension of one year. I assume that no Senator is astonished that this measure should make its appearance at this time. These extensions follow the original appropriation as the shadow follows the substance. They seem to be inseparable.

The Senate may have gathered that I have a rather decided fixed conviction that the relationship of creditor and debtor never ought to be created between the general government and the private citizen. It is an impossible relationship. It is bound to be fraught, in the long run, with more of mischief than of benefit. If the loan is repaid, it is likely unsatisfactory to the debtor. If it is not repaid, it ought to be unsatisfactory to the Government, unsatisfactory to the creditor. It creates a relationship that can not possibly please both parties concerned.

Whether those loans ought to have been made in the first instance brings up a debatable question, I may avow. Perhaps the extension of those loans is not debatable. I am rather inclined to the view that in this hour of distress loans which have been made, whether wisely made or not, ought to be extended, or that a reasonable policy of extension ought to be adopted. The loans involved in this extension amounted in the first instance to about $47,000,000. About 45 per cent—less than half—of those loans have been repaid by the farmers. The State making the largest percentage of repayment was Louisiana, 61 per cent. The State making the second largest repayment was Alabama, 60 per cent, perhaps as sorely distressed as any State in the Union. Oklahoma came third with 59 per cent, and I feel a just pride, I may say, in so liberal a showing as to payments made by the citizenship of my State.

I merely wanted to raise the point that some States have repaid only 3 per cent and several only 7 per cent. In the States that have paid 60 per cent of these obligations, what will the farmers think when they realize other States have made repayments to the extent of only 3 per cent? Will they not reach the conclusion that they were "easy marks" and that they took their obligations to their Government too seriously? Will it not discourage repayments in the future?

Those are the observations I desire to make, but I will say that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has perhaps overpersuaded me not to offer the amendment which I had intended. I never had any purpose to obstruct the passage of the measure. I think the loans, whether wisely made or not, ought to be extended in deserving or distressed cases. I have intended to move to strike out the word "application" in line 1, page 4, and to insert the words "upon sufficient and satisfactory showing"; so amended the bill would enable any farmer who makes a sufficient and satisfactory showing to obtain an extension of his loan. I thought that would be a mark of appreciation as well as justice toward those farmers who through self-denial and self-sacrifice have discharged their debts to their Government notwithstanding this depression. The committee in its report says that it assumes that extensions will be made only in deserving cases and upon an ample showing. On the strength of that assumption and upon the request of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] I shall not offer the amendment which I had in mind.

I will ask to print in the RECORD a statement showing the repayments made by each State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will be stated.

The amendment was on page 1, line 3, after the word "authorized," to strike out the words "and directed," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, upon the application of any farmer in the drought, storm, flood, and/or hail stricken areas of the United States to whom an advance or loan was made, for the crop of 1931, pursuant to the provisions of Public Resolution No. 112, approved December 20, 1930, as amended, or the provisions of the next to the last paragraph of the Department of Agriculture appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, approved February 23, 1931, to extend the time of repayment by such farmer of any such advance or loan for a period of one year from the date of maturity thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMERGENCY CREDIT EXPANSION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 3616.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in obedience to a very explicit resolution of the Senate unanimously adopted at the last session of Congress a subcommittee of the Banking and Currency Committee was appointed, of which I was made chairman, to hold hearings and to report with recommendations to the Senate, a bill covering the problems set forth in the resolution. Accordingly, the subcommittee had protracted and searching hearings, at which the various aspects of the problems involved were discussed with experienced bankers, economists of reputation, and with a large group of witnesses especially qualified to deal with such questions.

USEFUL DISCLOSURES

At the conclusion of those hearings the subcommittee proceeded, in conjunction with its technician, to draft a measure based upon those data and the information generally acquired at the hearings and through answers to questionnaires. If no other good may ensue from that procedure it would have been worth while, if for no other reason than that it compelled disclosures to the subcommittee by the banking community and by the supervisory officials of the banks of the country which revealed a situation, if not menacing, at least distinctly disturbing.

Hence, when members of the subcommittee were hurriedly and urgently called into conference by high executive authorities and the supervising officials of our banking system and asked to take from the measure thus framed certain of its provisions and apply them to an existing situation, although the proposals did not completely commend themselves to my deliberate judgment or perhaps to that of my colleagues, I at least was unwilling—and I think my colleagues also were unwilling—to be put in the attitude of obstinacy in face of these more or less alarming representations.

A QUICK TRANSFER FOR EMERGENCY

That bill, by the way, was never intended as a measure of relief for the existing depression, but was intended more to avert a repetition of a disaster which should never have come to this country and never would have come but for maladministration in the banking community and among the supervisory officials. Among its provisions was one intended to be permanent, for the relief of the credit systems in time of exigency. We agreed to lift that provision out of the bill, and with two other provisions, one already agreed to by the subcommittee, put it in a separate emergent measure.

GROUP BANKING

This particular provision cited by me harked back to periods of distress when currency panics seized the banking community and resulted in incalculable injury to the commerce of the country, when it became necessary to form clearing-house associations throughout the country and to issue clearing-house certificates, a form of illicit and unauthorized currency.

We also had in mind the enactment by the Congress of what was known as the Vreeland-Aldrich emergency measure, the product of that high priest of the financial element of the Nation—the great former Senator from Rhode Island—but so stringent was that measure, so exacting in its various provisions, that we felt in this provision of our bill it should be very greatly liberalized.

Under the Vreeland-Aldrich emergency law provision was made for the great banks alone. No bank might join the group of 10 banks that had a capital of less than $5,000,000; no bank might derive any advantage from the issuance of its currency that had not outstanding 40 per cent of circulation based upon its own capital. It was ascertained in later years, when for the first and only time we had occasion to make use of the Vreeland-Aldrich law, that even some of the large banks, including two of the largest banks in New York, could not get a dollar of currency under that law because each of them had less than 40 per cent of outstanding circulation. Therefore we inserted in this bill the provision, lifted out of our permanent measure, liberalizing the provisions of the Vreeland-Aldrich law.

We provide in the first section for the organization of groups of banks authorized, after using their eligible assets, to get accommodation at their respective reserve banks on paper not now eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks. Originally, our provision was for a minimum of 10 banks, but, in a yielding mood, we agreed to reduce that to five banks. The proposition of the experts sent up from the Treasury and the Federal reserve system was that "a unanimous vote of the members of the Federal Reserve Board" should be required to authorize these rediscounts. The Senate committee reduced that to a vote of six members of the board. No limitation is put upon the amount of credit that may thus be obtained at a Federal reserve bank. That is left altogether within the discretion of the directors of the reserve bank, upon the approval of six members of the Federal Reserve Board.

INCREDIBLE SELFISHNESS

It has been objected to that provision that strong banks will not assist the weaker banks in any Federal reserve district, a statement, Mr. President, which to me involves an imputation of incredible selfishness on the part of the banking community. To think that as many as five banks in any considerable community may not be willing to organize themselves in a group to avert the failure and consequent disaster of one or more other banks in that community is to assume that the bankers of the country have not even an intelligent selfishness, because the failure of any one of the weaker banks in any given community has its reactionary effect upon the stronger banks and, it is readily conceivable, might bring disaster to them also. So we provide that there may be this species of group banking in the populous centers, where it may readily be employed and prove effective.

BANKS MUST NOT USE ELIGIBLE ASSETS

It was universally agreed, without any qualification whatever, at the executive conferences and at every other place, that no banks should be helped with their ineligible assets unless and until they had exhausted their eligible assets; in other words, we did not entertain for a moment the idea that the banks of the country might retain in their portfolios their eligible commercial paper and assets and unload on the Federal reserve banks their "cats and dogs," their "chips and whetstones," their utterly immobile, unliquid, and in many, if not in most, instances worthless assets. Therefore the protest that now comes from some banking sources against that provision of the bill ought not to be tolerated an instant by the Congress.

There have been some misinterpretations of one sentence of that provision of the bill which, by common consent, has been clarified by the expert draftsmen of the Treasury Department; and to that I will make allusion when we begin to consider the bill section by section.

AID TO COUNTRY BANKS

Having provided for the larger banks in populous centers, it was asked what might be done for the country banks, for smaller banks so detached from commercial and financial centers as to make it exceedingly inconvenient, if not actually impossible, for them either to organize into a group or readily to join an existing group.

It was agreed that they should be relieved; hence the second section of the bill already agreed to by our subcommittee was lifted out and incorporated in this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. GLASS. I do.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I should like to ask the Senator, before he passes from the first section to the second one, to explain just what types of paper may be employed by a group of five or more banks when they have exhausted the rediscount privileges of the eligible paper.

Mr. GLASS. Any type which the Federal reserve banks, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, may by regulation admit.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is no limitation at all as to that?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GLASS. If it please the Senate, I should like to proceed with my general explanation of the bill and then submit myself to any questions that may be asked, because I am not like the trained speakers of this body who can readily submit to interruptions and then resume the thread of their remarks.

So that the second section of this bill, Mr. President, by express agreement, was intended for the relief of detached banks, of the smaller banks outside of commercial and financial centers where banks might readily organize themselves into groups.

When I presented the bill to the general Banking and Currency Committee, and undertook an explanation of that section, it was suggested that the text of the provision did not confine this relief to the country banks; that, as drawn, it might be used by any bank. Under that interpretation of the provision we could never, of course, hope to have a single group formed under the first provision of the bill. If any bank, large or small, might avail itself of the privilege extended, it would not, we are seriously told, join a group even to save a community. Therefore, upon motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND] and I were expressly authorized so to alter that section as to make its application unmistakably to the smaller banks; and we did that—at least, we thought we did it—by providing a limitation upon the capital of any individual bank applying for relief under this provision of the bill.

First, it was suggested that a capital of $300,000 would be a proper limitation. Afterwards we agreed that a half million dollars, perhaps, would be a proper limitation and provided accordingly. With that single exception the bill that the Senate now has under consideration is the bill that was unanimously authorized to be reported from the Banking and Currency Committee.

LARGE BANKS NOT TO PREEMPT LOANS

There have come demands from the large banks of the country, stimulated by inspired telegrams from certain sources, that all banks should be permitted to come in under the single-bank provision of the law. To permit that would simply vitiate completely the first provision of the bill. It would be futile, idle, to retain the first provision of the bill if any bank, regardless of its size and its resources, could take advantage of the second provision of the bill. These inspired demands simply reveal to me that somebody who never had any great solicitude for the small banks of the country would return us to a situation recently revealed that amounted to a scandal, when 38 banks out of a membership then of about 8,000 in the Federal reserve system, 38 great banks easily identified as speculative institutions with large extensions on the stock exchange, were borrowing two-thirds of the outstanding loans of the Federal reserve banking system. I can not conceive that the Congress of the United States would want to put the system again in that jeopardy by opening this provision of the bill without restriction to any and all banks that might want to apply.

Over and over again we were told by the experts of the Treasury Department and of the board and by those high officials who were brought in consultation with us that that provision was intended for the country banks, for the smaller banks that were so detached geographically that they might not avail themselves of the group provision.

In passing, I may say that, responsive to tremendous pressure from various sources upon those who seemed to be in charge of the measure, we had conferences extending over a period of two days, at which it was finally agreed to increase this capital limitation to $2,000,000, and an amendment to that effect very likely will be offered by one of my colleagues. It was utterly contrary to my own view and judgment; but I have been in Congress long enough to have found out that my judgment does not always prevail, and very likely should not always prevail. We had to reach some common ground, some agreement, in order to get along with this measure. Therefore, in this case as in many others, I am distressed to say, I subordinated my own judgment to that of others, and we agreed that I would not contest on the floor the proposition to make that sum $2,000,000. We did that in the face of a terrific drive by people who have always sought to conduct banking business at liberty and without restraint, and who were clamoring to have no limitation at all put upon the size of banks that might apply for this relief. So that is my defense for having yielded my own judgment in that regard.

With that limitation of $2,000,000 there are but 136 banks out of 7,600 that could be affected, and they are in populous communities, where they may readily organize a group to save any of the weaker banks of that community, and where, if they have intelligence and any degree of unselfishness, they will organize a group to save the weaker banks in the community. If they have any appreciation of their own situation, if they have any comprehension of what may happen to them unless they do this, they will organize a group, and there are but 136 of them distributed as to Federal reserve districts as follows:

Boston	11
New York	34
Philadelphia	12
Cleveland	16
Richmond	9
Atlanta	9
Chicago	10
St. Louis	6
Minneapolis	4
Kansas City	6
Dallas	4
San Francisco	15

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator will just let me, in my layman's way, explain these provisions, I shall then be very glad to answer any questions I can.

Mr. BROOKHART. I will.

TO FORTIFY "FREE GOLD"

Mr. GLASS. The only other provision of the bill is one that I feel some degree of perplexity in attempting to explain, because it involves not only a domestic problem but an international situation.

As stated in the report of the committee, it is intended by the third provision of this bill to permit the Federal reserve banks, by a vote of a majority of the Federal Reserve Board, to use United States securities for the protection of what is called in banking nomenclature the "free gold" supply.

As Senators, of course, know, the requirement of the law is that there shall be 40 per cent gold reserve behind Federal reserve notes, the balance of the security being in eligible paper. Just to the extent that the Federal reserve banking system has free gold, it may make advances to member banks in excess of outstanding loans, fortified by the required 40 per cent gold cover. I think the reserves of the system now total, perhaps, about 76 per cent rather than 40 per cent. So that the system has now, or had the other day, when the figure was reported to me, about $465,000,000 of free gold, and could make additional loans if they had eligible commercial paper in hand. But they have not the commercial paper, and therefore they want to make use, for a limited period, of United States bonds behind the notes.

Those in authority express to us the hope that they may never have to use that provision of the bill. I am not misled by that sort of optimism. I think it very likely that they will have to use that provision of the bill.

I suppose I may, without exceeding the caution which ought to be observed, say that the reserve system has been threatened with raids upon its gold supply by foreign nations, notably by France. I would not have said that here had it not been publicly said elsewhere; so I repeat it here. There has been that threatening situation, the conjecture—and it is a conjecture—being that this foreign country hopes to affect the attitude of this Nation with respect to reparations and her indebtedness to the United States. I do not make that assertion; I say that is conjectured in some quarters.

Apparently the officials of the Bank of France have outwitted some of the officials of the Federal reserve system and have them in that rather awkward position. The real purpose of this section of the bill is to put foreign nations upon notice that if they, in conjunction with their business men, want to raid the gold supply over here, we have this method of meeting the situation.

NO REAL NEED OF HYSTERIA

I think it is due to my own intellectual integrity and my past record on questions of this kind to say I have not wanted to be stampeded. I have not wanted to share the fear with which some people seem to have been seized about these matters. I particularly have contested, from the beginning, the persistent assertions that there was any urgent need for these devices, except the last one. There is no paucity of eligible assets in the portfolios of the member banks of the Federal reserve system, nor is there any basis for the shabby talk elsewhere about the Federal reserve system having broken down. It has not broken down. The member banks of the system, the banking community of the United States, have ceased to function through abject fear and have communicated this fear to depositors. That is where the breakdown is.

I have here authoritative statements from the officials of the Federal reserve system that to-day the Federal reserve banks are in position to make loans in excess of those outstanding of nearly $4,000,000,000. Who will say that if we might expand to-day to the extent of $4,000,000,000 the situation would not be cured?

The Federal reserve member banks have in their portfolios eligible paper which would not only absorb the $4,000,000,000 which the Federal reserve banks might loan but $4,500,000,000 more.

Note these figures. The member banks of the Federal reserve system have in their portfolios a total of $2,997,167,000 of eligible commercial assets, within $3,000,000 of $3,000,000,000 of eligible commercial paper.

In addition to that, they have on hand $5,564,461,000 of United States securities, usable for rediscount purposes.

The 12 Federal reserve banks, therefore, according to the latest available quarterly report, have usable paper in the immense volume of $8,561,628,000!

At the last quarterly report they were rediscounting only $465,711,000, as against this $8,561,000,000. In other words, the 7,600 member banks have free approximately $8,100,000,000 of eligible assets, if they will only use them.

Let us take it bank by bank. Take the Boston Federal Reserve Bank. The member banks of the Boston district have in their portfolios $212,501,000 of eligible commercial paper, $330,322,000 of United States securities, making a total of usable paper of $542,823,000, and are discounting but $25,277,000.

New York: The member banks of the New York district have in their portfolios $940,151,000 of eligible commercial paper. They have, in addition to that, $2,196,881,000 in United States securities. They have a total of $3,136,032,000 which may be used for rediscount purposes, and are rediscounting to the extent of only $95,764,000.

Philadelphia: The member banks of that district have $208,060,000 of eligible paper, $365,901,000 of United States securities, a total of $573,961,000 of usable paper, and are discounting only to the extent of $73,209,000.

Cleveland: The member banks of this district have $173,861,000 of eligible paper, $567,449,000 of United States securities, making a total of usable paper of $741,310,000, and are discounting to the extent of $67,250,000.

Richmond: The member banks of this district have $141,104,000 of usable paper, $154,000,000 of securities, total usable volume $295,521,000, and they are discounting $35,000,000.

Atlanta: The Federal reserve banks in this district have $131,526,000 of eligible paper in the Cotton Belt, $160,517,000 of United States securities, a total of $292,043,000 of usable securities, and they are rediscounting at the Federal reserve banks to the extent of $34,409,000.

Chicago, from which point we have had some valuable advice: The member banks of the Chicago Federal reserve district have in eligible paper $328,991,000 and in securities $664,147,000. They have within $7,000,000 of a billion dollars of usable securities, to wit, $993,138,000, and, mark this, that they are rediscounting to the extent of $27,144,000.

St. Louis has $138,746,000 of commercial paper and $152,731,000 of securities, making a total of $291,477,000, and they are discounting $19,254,000.

In the Minneapolis district the member banks appear to think it is a disgrace to patronize the Federal reserve bank. Instead of being ready to respond to the demands of commerce and to accommodate the merchants and the industries and the business of that district, they have on hand $164,332,000 of commercial paper and $121,997,000 of securities. They have a volume of $286,329,000 eligible for rediscount and are discounting $4,699,000.

Kansas City has $192,398,000 of commercial paper and $199,625,000 of securities, a total of $392,050,000, and is discounting to the extent of $15,398,000.

Dallas, in the Cotton Belt, has $156,034,000 of eligible paper in the portfolios of its member banks and $130,590,000 of securities, a total of $287,624,000, and is rediscounting to the extent of but $16,817,000.

San Francisco has of commercial paper $209,423,000, of eligible securities $519,857,000, making a total of $729,280,000, and is discounting to the extent of $51,370,000.

So we return to the total of $8,561,628,000 of usable paper and a total discounting of but $465,711,000!

When, from time to time, I have confronted gentlemen with these figures, unanswerable in themselves, I have been met with the response, "Oh, there is plenty of commercial eligible assets, but the distribution is defective." Let us see. The figures themselves show that the distribution is not defective. Here are supplemental figures which prove the case mathematically.

Out of 7,600 member banks of the system there are but 91 banks without eligible assets for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks. Here is the distribution of the 91 banks destitute of eligible assets:

Boston has 383 member banks and there are but three of the 383 member banks which are destitute of eligible paper.

New York has 876 member banks. There are but four without eligible assets, according to the official figures furnished to me.

The Philadelphia district has 740 member banks. There are but 15 without eligible assets.

Cleveland has 698 member banks and there are but 21 without eligible assets.

Richmond has 448 member banks and there are but 7 without eligible assets.

Atlanta has 363 member banks, with only 2 without eligible assets.

Chicago has 960 member banks, with only 5 without eligible assets.

St. Louis has 500 member banks, with only 5 with no eligible assets.

Minneapolis has 597 member banks, with only 7 without eligible assets.

Kansas City has 844 member banks, with but 4 without eligible assets.

Dallas has 645 member banks and but 1 without eligible assets.

San Francisco has 545 member banks and but 11 without eligible assets.

I have a statement from Federal reserve banking authorities as of date January 30, 1932, giving me the existing lending power of the respective Federal reserve banks over and above their outstanding loans as of that date.

The Boston bank may discount $232,000,000 in addition to its outstanding loans; the New York bank, $1,206,000,000; the Philadelphia bank, $198,000,000; the Cleveland bank, $300,000,000; the Richmond bank, $121,000,000; the Atlanta bank, $94,000,000; the Chicago bank, $831,000,000. Those are the amounts of loans that the banks are prepared to make in addition to those outstanding. St. Louis may make $102,000,000 additional loans; Minneapolis, $75,000,000; Kansas City, $98,000,000; Dallas, $52,000,000; and San Francisco, $190,000,000.

The member banks have in their portfolios twice as much usable paper as the 12 Federal reserve banks are able to rediscount, over and above their outstanding loans.

That being so, Mr. President, I individually have not been greatly impressed by the talk of "broadening the base for eligible paper." Nevertheless, I prepared last July and inserted in our permanent bill the provision, now transferred to this emergency measure, to avert a repetition of the present disaster. I refer to the provision of the bill authorizing banks, in certain exigencies and under certain restrictions, to use ineligible assets in rediscount operations.

THE MEASURE REASSURING

The trouble is that the banking community of the country is frightened to death. The banks have ceased to function. They have discarded the idea, without warrant, that the Federal reserve system was intended for a situation like this. They do not seem to realize that they can and should get this accommodation. But it is not within the province of the Congress to compel a bank to borrow money if it will not borrow money. The chief psychological advantage of this measure—and it is perhaps a valuable psychological advantage—is that it gives assurance to these frightened and timid bankers throughout the country that if they will only respond to the requirements of commerce, if they will only help in relieving themselves and the country from this depression and in doing so exhaust their eligible assets, then and only then may they make use of their ineligible assets.

Mr. President, it has not been an easy or a comfortable ordeal to which this subcommittee has been subjected. I have hundreds of telegrams here on my desk remonstrating with me for having deserted my convictions and "surrendered to the wild inflationists of the country." All of them may be voiced by this telegram from my State:

> Must say I am disappointed and distressed that you lend your good name and office to promote a scheme for inflation. I have always supported you politically and financially.

[Laughter.]

The nature of his protest is considerably modified by the latter statement. Neither this man nor any other ever spent a dollar on me at an election, nor have I ever spent one myself.

REFUSES TO BE OBSTINATE

I have no apology to make for refusing to be put in the attitude of contumacy or of obstinacy when those responsible for the administration of this Government and for the great banking systems confront me with disclosures that would seem to indicate that something of this kind is necessary. I conclude that, if only for psychological reasons, it is desirable to give this assurance and to try by this means to get the member banks of the Federal reserve system to realize their responsibilities and their obligations to the Nation and to stop hoarding and to lend money for proper purposes upon authorized securities.

The subcommittee has written into this bill every safeguard that has been put there. It has not been subservient to those in power. It has not trusted to selfish interests to write this bill for the committee. These now are trying to break it down. Even from responsible sources there have been put into my hands documents which I intend to preserve as mementos of their folly, embodying propositions that would destroy the Federal-reserve banking system, that would deprave our currency and take us the way that Germany and continental Europe have gone by depreciating their notes and starting their printing presses. We have steadily resisted all that sort of thing. Now we appeal to the Senate of the United States to sustain us in what we have done.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I should like to ask the Senator why the committee did not follow the recommendation of the experts as to "unanimous consent of the Federal Reserve Board" being required to enable any Federal reserve bank to make advances to member banks?

Mr. GLASS. Because it was represented to us that at some time, in an emergency, it might be impossible to assemble all the members of the board; some member might be sick; some member might be away.

COVERT HOSTILITY

Some bankers appear to feel it a personal affront that we have not permitted them to write the bill. Two of them, who have pestered Senators with letters recently, sent hundreds of telegrams from one end of the country to the other in a precipitate effort to kill the so-called "Glass bill." They professed to me not to understand the meaning of our proposed measure to avert disaster by restrictions on unwise banking; but they discovered its meaning between my office and the Western Union telegraph office, and wired banking officials throughout the United States to kill the bill. I do not know what has been the experience of other Senators, but I felicitate myself that the bankers of Virginia at least knew that I could not be swayed by anything of that sort. I got just one telegram, and that gentleman got one letter, and I venture to say he would, if he could, withdraw his telegram. [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have heard the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee make allusions to what has been the course of banking action in the city of Chicago. I myself am not able to prove that I am an expert in banking, either in lending or in borrowing, but I should like to ask the able Senator, if it be true, as it must be, that there has been some form of error in the conduct of banking affairs at Chicago and in that Federal reserve district; conscious as I am that those in positions of responsibility did the best they could for their community—and they have been met with many in distress—I would ask the Senator if he does not feel that the country ought now to know who was the source and what is the influence that allowed 38 of those institutions of this country the particular favor of drawing the large sum to which he has alluded in his splendid utterance as against the very many that were denied the equal privilege?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not think we ought to go into that; that is not helpful to what we now want to accomplish. I am not particularly anxious to disclose or to criticize what has been done in the past. To the extent I have done that I have done it as a warning to the Senate against the covert and urgent influences that are now at work trying to mutilate this bill and trying to defeat another bill designed to avert a repetition of this frightful financial disaster; and I hope they are not going to succeed.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Virginia stated that there was in gold a reserve of something like 70 per cent in this country at the present time.

Mr. GLASS. The figure is 76 per cent, I think.

Mr. WHEELER. Yes; 76 per cent. May I ask the Senator what proportion of that is earmarked for France or other countries?

Mr. GLASS. None of it. According to my latest information, France has about $600,000,000 earmarked at the New York Federal Reserve Bank. It is gradually withdrawing that gold. I think $107,000,000, not altogether belonging to France, went out in January last.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Montana, in part, asked the question which I desired to ask, and that is how much gold is there in this country subject to be withdrawn by foreign countries?

Mr. GLASS. We have been told in our deliberations that France has or had some days ago, about $600,000,000 and I have been told in conversation that other European institutions and individuals have impounded in the banks in this country approximately $250,000,000 more that may be withdrawn.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if foreign nations should withdraw the gold which they now have on deposit in this country, the United States would still have over half the gold of the world in its possession, would it not?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know exactly how much the United States would have. The Federal reserve bank would have $465,000,000 of free gold; and should any part of it be impinged by withdrawals or domestic raids, it could utilize the third section of this bill for its business.

Mr. BORAH. Well, the United States and France are supposed to have about 70 per cent of all the gold in the world.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; except $100 that the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] says his son has. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. I did not catch the Senator's answer.

Mr. GLASS. I said all except perhaps a hundred dollars in gold that somebody presented to the son of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] as a Christmas gift. The boy was wittily boasting that he and France and the United States had all the gold in the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. I think the boy was practically correct.

Mr. GLASS. I think practically he was.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator just referred to the fact that, outside of the $600,000,000 that is earmarked in the Federal reserve bank in New York for the credit of France, other countries and individuals have impounded about $250,000,000 in gold in this country. What function is being performed by that $250,000,000 so impounded, if it is to be used for any function, while it is thus impounded?

Mr. GLASS. It may be in the vaults of the individual banks and used as a reserve for loaning purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is not a part of that gold, of course, which is being used as a basis for the issue of currency on the part of the United States?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. President, I may frankly say that while I have been willing to provide against any contingency that might arise, this country need have no fear of what foreign countries may do. That is my judgment of the case, and, while I am perfectly willing—not perfectly willing, but reluctantly willing—to provide this safeguard, I have not been much impressed by the assurance that it will never be used. I think it will be used to a limited extent.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Is it not true that France has not $600,000,000, but has four hundred and odd million dollars that are earmarked, and by "earmarked" is meant that the bags of gold have a tag on them to the effect that the gold contained therein does not belong to the United States nor to the Federal reserve system, but belongs to the Bank of France, so that such gold is not used for any purpose here, but it is simply for safe storage?

Mr. GLASS. That is not altogether the fact. The fact is that some time back officials of the Federal reserve bank in New York required France to invest a part of that gold in bills and other securities in this country.

Mr. KEAN. I mean to say that does not count in any way——

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; this country has $465,000,000——

Mr. KEAN. So that all that France could withdraw which would affect the Federal reserve bank is about $200,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. I have said—at least I think I have—that the Federal reserve banks have $465,000,000, exclusive of French gold.

Mr. KEAN. Yes. Is it not also true that all that France could ship per week would not be over sixteen or seventeen million dollars, because they can not get insurance on more than that to cover the ships?

Mr. GLASS. I can not undertake to answer that question. I have not gone into those details. I noted in the financial reports of the New York Times and other New York papers day before yesterday that $107,000,000 had been exported during the month of January.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator two or three questions.

Mr. GLASS. Make them easy, please.

Mr. NORRIS. They are not hard, because I think I understand them myself, even.

In view of the immense amount of eligible assets, both in paper and other assets, that can be used for additional circulation and borrowing at the various Federal reserve banks, why is it necessary that we pass legislation—for I understand that that is the object of this bill—to create additional assets that can be used?

ENCOURAGING BANKS TO LOAN

Mr. GLASS. I answer that, Mr. President, by repeating that it amounts to an assurance to the great body of frightened bankers that if they will use their eligible assets, and they should become depleted, they might resort to this other method of securing credits at the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator discloses that the record shows that there are now something over $8,000,000,000 scattered, from the Senator's statement, very fairly over the country that can be used for that purpose.

Mr. GLASS. But it is not being used.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that it is not being used.

Mr. GLASS. And the purpose of this bill now, in this emergency, is to cause the banks to function and to use a large part of it. I may say to the Senator that I myself do not think they are going to have much occasion to use these provisions.

Mr. NORRIS. There is certainly no fear on the part of the banks that there is any immediate danger of the exhaustion of this $8,000,000,000.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, every bank is taking care of itself, with the old suggestion that "the devil may take the hindmost."

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, the banks are guilty of hoarding money, which they are charging against the people generally.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator another question or two.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was in that connection that I wanted to make a statement, with the permission of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The question that the Senator asks quite naturally arises in the mind of anyone. The condition to which he has referred with respect to eligibility finds a parallel with respect to deposits in banks.

The banks are frightened. In consequence, they have stopped making loans. They have pressed collection of amounts due them. They have an abundance of money. Nearly every bank that is open has more money than it ever had before in its history, but it is not making loans and it is collecting every dollar that it can collect; so that it is going through a process that can be literally described as hoarding.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the way I described it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is absolutely true. Of course, the same thing is true in a measure with respect to eligible paper.

Many of the banks—most of the banks, as shown by the very remarkable and illuminating statement made by the Senator from Virginia—have an enormous amount of paper that they have not used and that they do not intend to use. It seems that in order to restore their courage they want back of the large amount of paper that they have, and the enormous amount of money that they have on deposit, an assurance that if they loan their money, if they rediscount their eligible paper, they will still have a resource of paper upon which to draw. It is a most remarkable condition, an astonishing situation, that with only a few member banks in the United States that have exhausted their eligible paper, it should be made to appear that the whole system is in danger.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Virginia will yield further——

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems perfectly plain to me that when we have these astounding amounts of eligible paper scattered all over the United States and held by the member banks that can be used for the purpose of rediscount at the Federal reserve banks, we are now asked to pass a law that would increase, as every man knows it will increase, away beyond any possible use, this stupendous amount already piled mountain high.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I am convinced that this legislation is desirable, and I do hope the Senate will pass it as speedily as possible. There are, at certain points, distressing conditions, threatening conditions. Not only is this bill intended to produce a healthy psychology in the manner of lending money by banks, but it is intended to produce a psychology that will appease the fright of depositors and arrest withdrawals from banks; and withdrawals from a bank, even though it have eligible paper, might speedily exhaust its eligible paper.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. REED, and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. To whom does the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield first to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me complete a statement that I made, or attempted to make, just a few moments ago.

Almost every bank has been threatened with a run. I know a number of banks, which, in my humble judgment, were entirely solvent, which were compelled to close their doors because of the fact that runs were continued to the point where the banks were threatened with insolvency or became insolvent. While that condition of hysteria—perhaps it is more accurate to describe it as a condition of fright—prevails in the minds of the depositors, it is communicated to the bankers themselves. Each fear feeds upon the other, and gathers volume, so that the banks stop loaning, press collections, pile up money within their vaults, refuse to avail themselves of their eligible paper, discontinue functioning, the communities are deprived of banking facilities, they gather fright, and the problem is constantly being augmented and intensified.

The reason why the banks have accumulated all the money they can and the reason why they are slow to avail themselves of the right of discount when they possess eligible paper, is the fact that they are afraid that a line of depositors will form outside and begin the withdrawal of cash. It is a fact that almost every bank that is now open in the United States is attempting to maintain its liquidity to such a degree that it has almost as much money as it has total deposits; and, of course, even those who have no more experience in banking than one of my limited experience realize that when a bank gets in that situation, it is not functioning.

The value of this legislation, as I see it, is twofold. It does afford assistance to the banks that are without eligible paper. It does stimulate courage on the part of bank officials who possess eligible paper and are afraid to use it, because they think they may require it as a source of credit in order to meet withdrawals from their own depositors.

Mr. GLASS. And if we will just pass the bill, it will do more in 10 minutes to stimulate redeposits in the banks than these mass meetings that are now being held throughout the country will do to drive them out.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GLASS. I will; yes.

Mr. REED. What are the aggregate deposits at the present time of the member banks of the country?

Mr. GLASS. I have seen it stated that there are forty billions in loans by all the banks; but, as the Senator knows, there are nearly 20,000 nonmember banks.

Mr. REED. Yes. I meant the member banks. I wondered whether the Senator carried the figure in his head.

Mr. GLASS. I do not recall the figures right now.

Mr. REED. I only desire to add one observation, and perhaps the Senator from Arkansas has already anticipated it. It seems to me that the holding of these eligibles, and refraining from rediscounting them with the Federal reserve banks in order to get money to loan, is due to the same thought that leads the bank to hoard its cash reserves. In the mind of the banker or the intelligent depositor, eligible paper is in exactly the same position as money—available to meet a demand obligation of the bank itself—and if those eligibles were used to raise money for commerce, to be loaned out in commerce, it is just the same as lending out the cash on hand in commerce.

The great merit of the bill which the Senator has brought here is not that it is going to lead to any kind of inflation; it is not that it is going to be resorted to in many cases; but that it adds to the resources of every bank a new bunch of eligibles which, in the eyes of the banker and the depositors, are actually cash, because they can be converted into cash at any minute; and it seems to me the assurance that the bill will bring to the depositors of the country would justify the passage of it at a time like this, because, as we all know, these additional eligibles that are proposed are just as good as the United States Government is good.

Is that a correct statement of the matter?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has stated the matter much more lucidly than I could.

SPEEDY ACTION ASKED

Mr. REED. I did not mean to do that or to try to do it; but what we say here is going all over the country.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has correctly stated the case in few words. Mr. President, I again appeal to the Senate for prompt and favorable action on the bill. There is no pride of authorship involved here. I did not seek to be made chairman of the subcommittee directed by the Senate to investigate these banking problems. I responded to the appeal of the chairman of the general committee; and I have several times expressed the very fervent wish that the name of either the Senator here to my right [Mr. TOWNSEND] or the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] might be attached to this bill rather than my own. I simply appeal to the Senate not to delay matters upon technical objections or trivialities but to pass this bill and let us relieve this situation.

THE NATION'S GOLD SUPPLY AMPLE

Mr. REED. I am not proposing to delay it, or to ask enough questions to delaw the bill more than five minutes; but I want to ask the Senator one more question, if he will permit me, inspired again by the thought that what we say here is heard all over the United States. That is about these foreign withdrawals.

It is a fact, is it not, that this country is amply able to repay in gold every penny deposited in this country by foreign governments or foreign citizens, so far as they can be ascertained to be foreign citizens?

Mr. GLASS. At the present time; yes.

Mr. REED. Yes; at the present time. It is a fact that deposits of the French Government and of the Bank of France and of the French railways and these other institutions are all pretty well known; they are almost all in New York; and if they were all withdrawn at the present time, we could pay them in gold?

Mr. GLASS. I have said that I have no apprehension on that score; but, if we could not pay, the enactment of this bill would speedily help us to pay. If not, there is still another method provided by existing law.

Mr. REED. Exactly. Just one further question. Is not our position infinitely stronger after they have made their demand and had their payment than it is if that money is absorbed into the channels of American trade and is subject to be drawn out on demand at any time?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and we would be still stronger if we had never let them impound it here.

Mr. REED. Exactly; because we always let them send us money when we did not need it, and let them take it when we needed it most.

Mr. GLASS. And we ought to have nerve enough to reject it when they offer it.

Mr. REED. I hope we will, next time.

Mr. GLASS. I hope there will never be a next time.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in cataloguing the two types of eligible paper, composed of five and a half billion dollars of Government securities, by which I suppose he means Liberty bonds, and about three billion of commercial paper, is not the Senator able to advise us whether any of that three billion of commercial paper which may be legally and technically eligible on account of its character, is, in fact, ineligible because of its lack of liquidity, or for any other reason?

Mr. GLASS. No; if it is eligible it is eligible; it is within the requirements of the law.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand it is within the requirements of the law, but it may not always be within the requirements of fact. What I am seeking to draw out is that the entire three billion of commercial paper, therefore, is subject to no exception in the statement that it is eligible in law and in fact.

Mr. GLASS. It may be used for rediscount purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course; the five and a half billion is eligible without any question at all.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I note that the section about the Government securities provides that they shall not be less than the face value of the reserve notes issued. Is it within the discretion of the board to fix the amount of securities required for each dollar of reserve notes greater than the reserve notes?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but there would be no use doing that.

Mr. DILL. The Walsh bill provided up to 90 per cent, and what I am trying to get at is this, whether this bill makes it mandatory on the board to issue up to 100 per cent.

Mr. GLASS. Together with the gold and bonds behind the notes; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it seems to me the impression would probably be left by this discussion this afternoon that the banks were actuated by the same unreasoning fear in declining to make loans that motivate depositors in withdrawing their deposits from the banks and hoarding them. But let me inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether a more powerful reason is not the inability of the banks to find eligible loans to make in view of the situation?

In our section of the country, for instance, a year ago or two years ago it would have been quite justifiable for a bank to make a loan to a man who was engaged in the sheep business or the cattle business, but now it declines to do so because it fears that such a business will not be profitable. So in the industrial sections, where a bank in times past, only a few years ago, would freely loan funds to a manufacturer, or to a man engaged in commerce in one way or another, it now declines to do so because of the depressed prices of all commodities. It thinks that the enterprises may not be successful. Is not that really the reason why the banks do not make more loans?

Mr. GLASS. Not the sole reason, by any means. The fact that member banks have nearly $3,000,000,000 of eligible commercial paper means that there has been business to that extent transacted with the banks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. To that extent.

Mr. GLASS. To that extent I have no doubt on earth that business has tremendously slackened; but, on the other hand, complaints after complaints, by wire and by letter, and by word of mouth, have come to us that the banks are calling their loans over the protests of the borrowers, and are not, in many cases, making extensions or other loans. They are, all of them, intent on getting liquid and staying so until this storm is weathered. We can not reasonably censure the banks of any given community or section. All of them are engaged in this process of self-preservation. It is perhaps natural, but nevertheless deplorable.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is not that because they fear that, by reason of the depressed condition of business, they will not be able to collect their loans?

Mr. GLASS. The whole thing amounts to fear—not of the banks alone but of depositors as well.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not know whether the Senator is ready to discuss the separate provisions of the bill or not; or does he want us to take the bill just as it is and vote upon it?

Mr. GLASS. I would think that my colleagues on the committee might want to have something to say; and, in passing, I want to pay tribute to them.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Senator would prefer to hear from his colleagues on the committee, I will not ask him any questions now.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; let the Senator proceed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest that the bill be taken up section by section, when we get to that order, and consider provisions as we come to them.

Mr. COUZENS. I am not discussing any amendment, but I was asking the Senator from Virginia whether he wanted to discuss any of the provisions which were now in the bill, instead of waiting until they come up in order.

Mr. GLASS. I shall be very glad to do that. The Senator asked me whether I wanted the bill voted on as it is, and I responded by saying that I imagined my colleagues might want to say something.

Mr. COUZENS. I mentioned that only because the Senator was urging great speed and expedition in getting the bill through, and I thought perhaps I could expedite it by asking him for an interpretation of section 3. I draw the Senator's attention to line 19, on page 4, where the following language appears:

> Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such application shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or acceptances acquired under the provisions of section 13 of this act.

What does section 13 provide? It is not in this measure itself.

Mr. GLASS. Section 13 is existing law, and what the Senator has read has been existing law for 18 years.

Mr. COUZENS. But I observe on line 12, page 4, that no foreign obligations are permitted. Would they be permitted under section 13 of the old act?

Mr. GLASS. No; we distinctly exclude foreign obligations.

Mr. COUZENS. But not in section 3. In section 2 it is provided, beginning on line 12:

> No obligations of any foreign government, individual, partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws thereof shall be eligible as collateral security for advances under this section.

That language does not appear in section 3, and I am wondering whether the existing act, not this bill but the act itself, excludes the obligations of foreign governments.

Mr. GLASS. I feel sure it does; but I would have to refer to section 13 of the reserve act to make sure. That is the main section of the act relating to commercial, industrial, and agricultural discounts.

Mr. COUZENS. I raise that question because we ought to make sure that the foreign securities could not be used under that section for the securing of Federal notes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if I may interject, certainly the present Federal reserve law does not allow the issuance of currency, Federal reserve notes, to be secured by foreign obligations.

Mr. GLASS. Not against foreign obligations.

Mr. REED. Clearly they are not eligible for reserve purposes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I do not find the provision in this bill we are considering now, but I understand that the bill provides that there shall always be a coverage of 40 per cent of gold.

Mr. GLASS. It is in the bill. No change has been made in that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand it, there is 76 per cent of gold now held against Federal reserve notes.

Mr. GLASS. Seventy-six per cent of gold is held by Federal reserve banks against Federal reserve credits and Federal reserve notes; but nearly half of this gold is free and might respond to applications for additional credits and notes.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Let me ask the Senator this: Under existing law there has to be 40 per cent coverage against notes?

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and there is no change in that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand that. What I want to find out is this: Can notes now be issued against what is called free gold, which is not now covering Federal reserve notes under the various provisions of this measure?

Mr. GLASS. Against free gold and eligible paper; but they have not the eligible paper, and they want to use United States bonds.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As I understand it, they are limited to the amount of free gold that is now not required under the 40 per cent provision.

Mr. GLASS. They are limited to a 40 per cent reserve against notes and 35 per cent against credits.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator give us an idea as to how much currency can be issued under those provisions of this bill?

Mr. GLASS. No; I can not say how much. I can not say how soon the banks are going to use all of their eligible paper. If they should use their $3,000,000,000 of eligible commercial paper and a large part of their bonds, it can not now be told whether this immense contribution to outstanding credits would exhaust the demands of their respective communities. I suspect it would; but nobody can tell. It would depend upon the increase of business.

There is a potential "inflation," if you want to call it that; or, if the more sensitive and conservative persons dealing with the question want to call it "expansion," there is a potential "expansion" in the third provision of the bill of about a billion and a half dollars, provided the reserve banks do not increase their holdings of United States securities; but, as I have stated, we have been told that little actual use may be made of this provision of the bill except in pressing circumstances.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is there anything to limit the expansion except the provision that there shall be a 40 per cent coverage of gold?

Mr. GLASS. That is all, except the volume of United States bonds held.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I am afraid I did not make myself clear to the Senator. I did not ask how much currency would be issued under the bill; I asked him if he could tell us how much could be issued.

Mr. GLASS. I tried to answer that by saying there is about a billion and a half potential "expansion" in that provision of the bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLASS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator this, whether, when it was decided to accept the obligations of the United States as collateral security, any consideration was given to the question of accepting State or municipal bonds?

Mr. GLASS. No; and I hope there never will be.

Mr. COPELAND. It was not considered at all?

Mr. GLASS. No. It is bad enough to accept United States bonds. To that extent it takes us back to a bond-secured currency, from which we tried to get away for 50 years, and never did until we passed the Federal reserve act.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator's answer, then, is that to add State and municipal bonds would only make that section of the bill so much the worse?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has answered his question for me.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, we have listened this afternoon to what I believe is the most extraordinary exposition of our banking system ever made before this body. It has been made by a master mind who knows the intricacies of that system in every detail. No words of mine are needed to amplify or explain this extraordinary story.

Mr. President, our linen is out on the line and those who have eyes may observe. There are, of course, defects, but I want to analyze briefly the situation from a slightly different point of view to see whether I can not account in large measure for the situation as it exists to-day.

In the early days in Europe the peasants used to frighten their children into good behavior by threatening them with a sight of the mythological god Pan, a 2-legged creature with cloven hoofs, with a hairy chest, and repulsive face, an ogre. When his presence was threatened the children were all on good behavior. That word "Pan" is the origin of our word "panic." We are now afraid of Pan, a mythological creature. Fear has so beset us, so taken possession of our very souls that we are doing things to-day which we would not have dreamt of doing a year ago.

Applying this to our banking system, it comes out in this way. Business became seriously depressed by a falling off in our exports due to the economic collapse of the countries who purchased from us. With the depression of business came a reduction of loans for commercial purposes. The combination of circumstances over a period of two years has led us from a tremendous inflation, where we were pyramiding, pyramid upon pyramid, encouraged by the very system which now needs relief, as the able Senator from Virginia has so well explained, until our banking system became involved in a system of tremendous and unjustified speculation, paying little attention to net earnings, paying less attention to management.

The new generation was advertising the theory that we were in a new era, that we would never have to go back to the old acid test of security safety. They were so sure that the older men were advising them wrongly that they stepped into a furnace seven times hotter than ever before. They have been burned and many of them extinguished; gradually our whole credit system, terribly inflated, began through fear, through the violent collapse of the securities market, to contract unduly, to contract to the danger point. Consequently our dollar, always backed by gold, became unduly valuable. Our dollar to-day buys too much, because commodity prices are lower than they should be.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALCOTT. I would prefer to make a continuous statement without interruption.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to ask the Senator just one question.

Mr. WALCOTT. Very well.

Mr. WHEELER. Can the Senator tell me whether there is anything in the pending bill that will have any tendency to bring up the price level of commodities in general, particularly such commodities as wheat and cotton, that have to be sold upon the world market?

Mr. WALCOTT. I am trying to show the Senator approximately what will happen.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to have the Senator tell me, if he will, what there is in the bill that will raise the price level of such commodities. We have heard so much said to-day about bringing back prosperity. I would like to have the Senator point out, if he could or if he would, just how this bill will tend to raise commodity prices of wheat and tin, cotton and copper, or anything else that has to be sold upon the world market, for the reason, it seems to me, that we can not bring back prosperity in the country until such time as we can bring back the price level of those commodities. The statement has been made on the floor this afternoon to the effect that the banks have such a tremendous lot of money to lend. It is possible that they have not loaned money when they should have loaned money, but it is likewise true that there are very few people who will want to borrow money and go into business when commodity prices are dropping. I would like to have somebody explain, if they will, how this bill will improve the general price level of commodities.

Mr. WALCOTT. That is the purpose of what I have to say; I shall approach the subject gradually.

Mr. President, the attitude of Europe, plunged into abnormal debt, became unfriendly and perhaps still is. The question of international and interallied debts became an important factor. Without stopping to go into the details of that matter except to touch upon it as a very important factor in our international trade relations and in our export business and the ability of foreign peoples to buy our products, I come back to our domestic situation.

In 1900 there was a very rapid expansion of our banking system so that in approximately 10 years the number of our banks increased by almost 10,000, or almost doubled, there being about 10,000 banks in existence in this country in 1900. But, unfortunately for our system, a large proportion of those banks were State banks growing up under lax, overliberal State laws, in many cases with too low a minimum of capital, which was dangerous. Banks were incorporated with as little as $25,000 of capital. There were hundreds of those small, undercapitalized banks all over the country, and of course a large percentage of them in the then new and rapidly growing country of the Middle West and Northwest. Time has dealt roughly with those small and undercapitalized banks. One of the important things to do is to revise that figure of the minimum capitalization of a bank so that it is adequate to take care of the commercial business of even small towns.

The disaster that has befallen upon our banking system is marked by the failure of several thousand State banks and a very few Federal banks. By a Federal bank I mean this, by way of explanation: A national bank to be a national bank must be a member of the Federal reserve system; in other words, the Federal reserve system comprehends all the so-called member banks which are known to-day as national banks. If a national bank wishes to withdraw from the Federal reserve system voluntarily or because it can not comply with the more strict obligations of the Federal system, it automatically drops out from under the Federal laws and becomes a State bank, subject only to State laws.

During the 10 years previous to 1929, or from 1919 to 1929, approximately 6,000 banks failed in this country. In the last two years something like 3,500 banks have failed, an increasing ratio of failures due to the falling of our commodity prices, the shutting down of business, and the consequent depreciation in our industrial securities, particularly our railroad securities, which have had a disastrous time of it, affecting very largely the solvency of our banks and our insurance companies.

So we find ourselves in the predicament that we had commodity prices much too low, the dollar correspondingly too valuable, the purchasing power of the dollar too great, strange as it may seem, and business very largely paralyzed. What are we going to do about it? In the first place, we must eliminate fear from the situation. The figures which have been given us this afternoon by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] show that while our banking system is filled to overflowing with eligible paper commercial loans are not being made.

The result of this is that business is suffering, individuals are suffering, many banks have not been able to stand the strain. Those banks which have closed, however, are not the banks with the large supply of eligible paper, but those weaker banks in turn affect the attitude of the public toward the banking system, causing great alarm because of the freezing of the deposits and in many cases absolute loss in deposits. The net result is that with the direct and indirect effect of failing banks upon the banks that are still solvent, we have a situation where many of the banks of the country are hoarding eligible paper. There is no question about that. The facts show that clearly, as the Senator from West Virginia has so ably explained.

With that situation to deal with, there is only one remedy.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WALCOTT. I should like to answer questions after I shall have finished my statement. I want to show the effect of this bill upon commodity prices, and, so, if the Senator pleases, I prefer to answer his questions later.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the banks which to-day are hoarding eligible paper are numerous and business in the respective places where those banks are located finds it very difficult to borrow money. Currency is hard to get and loans are scrutinized with unusual care. That perhaps is perfectly sound, but the fact that loans in many cases are not being made by banks which ought to be making them, and which have plenty of reserve to warrant such loans, makes the situation impossible to bear. There can be no recovery, Senators, until that situation shall have been changed; until that eligible paper can find a place where it can be lodged safely and in its place cash, United States currency, can be issued. We all know this, of course, but for the sake of the record I make the statement.

The situation should be completely reversed from that of 1928, so that instead of being on a speculative basis where loans for the purchase of securities are abnormally high and many of the securities of doubtful or inflated value, we should be brought back to a commercial banking basis where business and industry are considered first, and the man who wants to speculate in securities is considered second or third or fourth.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WALCOTT. I very much prefer to continue the statement I am now making.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut declines to yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I will answer any questions a little later, but I desire to take a few moments to finish my statement.

What happens to the essential commodities such as copper, iron, lead, wheat, and cotton, all exportable?

If business has stopped, if business can not obtain commercial loans from the banks, or the banks become afraid and start to hoard their eligible paper, there can be no trade; potential purchasers are paralyzed by unemployment resulting from the stoppage of business; the sources of trade dry up, and the wholesale and retail stores are without customers. The finality is a complete clogging of our financial system. Our banks are closing partly because of a shrinkage in the value of their collateral and partly because of the unreasoning fear of the people who have deposited their money in the banks gradually drawing it out.

The cure for this is to allow the Federal reserve system to lend to the banks, if, in their judgment, the collateral is sound, upon more of their securities than can now be availed of, on securities that are to-day ineligible, but which, with more prosperous times, will recover in value to such an extent that what is C and D collateral to-day may become a year or two from now A and B collateral. The advance in values of securities, with the recovery of normal business, should be so great that almost any reasonable broadening of the base of eligibility at this time should be justified.

To call that inflation is perhaps justified; it is a kind of inflation; but it is not a dangerous kind. The dangerous kind of inflation would be to run our printing presses and issue greenbacks, paper money, without sufficient metallic reserve behind it, as Germany did following the World War. She repudiated her own mark until it became worthless and by that repudiation paid off her internal obligations to her own citizens from whom she had borrowed the sinews of war during the conflict, so that the German Government became solvent by completely wiping out all of her middle class. Germany being so successful in gaining national solvency encouraged France to follow suit. France let the franc go down until she could pay her national obligations to her own people with practically worthless paper, thus making her nationally solvent, and many of her people bankrupt. She, too, wiped out a large portion of her middle class, as did Germany.

We are doing the reverse. We are sticking absolutely to the gold standard, and, Mr. President, by the provisions of this bill we shall have our reserve of free gold built up so high that it will be a gold Gibraltar that will defy the world financially and no nation will be afraid to leave its gold with us, whether it is earmarked or whether it is not earmarked. Japan has millions of dollars in metallic gold on deposit to-day on the west coast. If we should let our gold reserve go down too low, Japan might be afraid to keep it there; but when this bill shall have been passed Japan or any other country can leave its gold on deposit here and know that it will be absolutely safe, and, in fact, in the safest place in the world. Twenty-four hours after the bill shall have been passed our potential free gold supply will be so large that the world will be amazed at our strength.

Furthermore, Mr. President, if we can broaden the base of eligible paper, we will have convinced the national banks of this country that they can return to normal commercial banking with absolute safety, because, in addition to their eligible paper which they may now be hoarding, the governors of the Federal reserve system will be able to lend them money on paper which is not now eligible. Restoration of commodity prices which will show the producers a profit should follow.

It should follow, as the day follows the night, if we strengthen our financial structure so as to protect not only the large banks but help to build up the credit of the smaller country banks we shall have restored commercial enterprises, we shall have restored the confidence of the people to such an extent that unemployment will decline and commodity prices increase with the added power to purchase. I very much hope that this bill will be passed for it is much needed. I am going to propose an amendment to clarify the language on page 3.

Mr. GLASS. I should think that would be in order, if I may say so to my colleague, when we begin to consider the bill provision by provision.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think it might be well if we could have the advantage of knowing what the proposed amendment is and could be able to consider it while the Senate is not in session; and so I suggest that the Senator tender the amendment at the desk and have it read so that it may be in the RECORD.

Mr. WALCOTT. Very well, I will send the amendment to the desk.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WALCOTT is as follows:

On page 2, line 3, after the word "the," to insert "provided the bank or banks which receive the proceeds of such advances as herein provided have no adequate amounts of eligible or acceptable assets available to enable such bank or banks to obtain sufficient credit accommodations from the Federal reserve bank through rediscounts or advances other than as provided in section 10 (b)."

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I can not let this opportunity pass without expressing the keen pleasure I have felt in working with a man of the character and the ability of my able and learned friend, the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS].

He has shown a willingness to cooperate always. I have never worked with a man with so much genuine pleasure as I have worked with him in digging out the details of this financial picture. The subcommittee of which he is the chairman has been laboring now for a little over a year, and I think has laid the basis of fact so that, having passed these emergency measures and helped the return to normalcy, we can make a study of the entire banking system and perhaps evolve some measures which will prevent a recurrence of the disaster that happened in 1929.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. WALCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. Taking section 3 of the bill, for instance, does the Senator believe that the Federal reserve banks will permit a small member bank to put up as security or as collateral for loans ineligible paper such as farm mortgages and collateral of that kind, or will the Federal reserve bank simply decline to take such paper, as they could do, and continue to accept as collateral the common stock of great corporations?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I may say, without fear of contradiction, I think, that, while the loans must be adequately secured in the opinion of the lender, yet if the Federal reserve system does not lend a willing and a courageous hand, within reasonable bounds as to adequacy, in building up our agricultural situation as well as our industrial situation, it will be a terrible disappointment.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, it must be perfectly obvious to anybody that we can not have any prosperity in this country unless we restore agriculture.

The thing that is needed more particularly in the agricultural sections than anything else is the ability of the farmer to borrow money upon his land so that he may carry on. To-day, Mr. President, the trouble all over the country in the agricultural sections is that the farmer, regardless of whether his land is mortgaged or not, or regardless of what he has, can not go to one of the banks in his community and borrow upon his land any money with which to do business. The banks have simply closed up entirely to the small borrower. In the past the legislation which has been enacted by Congress has reversed the situation. It has been enacted for the purpose of helping the bankers, for the purpose of helping the railroads and the industrialists, but thus far no legislation has been passed that is going particularly to help the distressed farmer who desires to borrow money upon farm lands.

If the Senator will pardon me further, he has referred to this country as being a Gibraltar so far as the gold standard is concerned. The truth about it, I think, as almost everyone will concede, is that what we have to-day is a banker's standard rather than a gold standard; but, in addition to that, if we remain upon the gold standard and the other countries of the world go off the gold standard, how is it going to be possible for our farmers—the cotton farmer and the wheat farmer—to compete with farmers in Australia, in Canada, in Argentina, if those countries are off the gold standard? It is a physical impossibility for the American wheat farmer to do so because of the fact that when he sells his wheat in Liverpool and brings his money back to this country it is immediately discounted 25 or 30 per cent, according to the value of the British pound.

It pays 25 or 30 per cent less of his indebtedness than does the Canadian or the Argentine or the Australian money. So, in my judgment, as long as we are on the gold standard and these other countries are off the gold standard it is going to be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to bring up our commodity price level on the things that have to be sold upon the world market.

Unless that is done I am convinced that we are not going to have any general prosperity. I think this bill may temporarily help some of the distressed banks; but to say that it is going to bring back general prosperity in this country in the near future, to my notion, is unwarrantedly arousing the hopes of the American people, and they will find that they will be very much disappointed with the result of it.

Particularly will the farming classes be disappointed, and the manufacturing classes who depend for their prosperity upon the sale of their products to the great bulk of the farming classes in the United States.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRISON. Has the Senator's committee gathered any statistics showing the extent to which the banks of the country have refused to make loans on paper eligible for discount at the Federal reserve system?

Mr. WALCOTT. I doubt if any such record is kept. The borrower is about the only man who knows whether or not he has been turned down.

Mr. MORRISON. So the criticism of the banks for not making loans of this character is not based on any reliable information, but it is simply the opinion of gentlemen making the statements that they have declined to make such loans?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the only fact on which we can base any statement of that sort is that there is a very large amount of eligible paper now in the possession of the banks which they could use if the Federal reserve system would lend, and if the member banks, in turn, were willing to borrow and thus let go part of their eligible paper.

Mr. MORRISON. Exactly; but suppose they have not, as a matter of fact, refused those loans, and suppose they have this paper now subject to discount. Before we can justly criticize them and call them hoarders, ought we not to know what their deposits are and what their total loans are and what proportion of those loans already made are eligible for discount, so as to ascertain whether they are in a position to rediscount paper to loan out in these dangerous times?

Mr. WALCOTT. The Senator, of course, is quite right. I do not think any words spoken here to-day are intended to charge the Federal reserve banks with being remiss in making loans; but I feel quite certain that there is a kind of partial paralysis through the banking system, partly because of the extreme deflation in the value of securities, partly because they know now that if they go on making loans more or less indefinitely on their present supply of eligible paper, and they approach anything like the end of that supply, they will not be able to go on beyond that. The purpose of this bill is to broaden the borrowing powers of the banks and their lending powers to individuals, to farmers, to industrial corporations. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. MORRISON. I understand that, Mr. President; but they have been criticized here by the Senator from Connecticut and by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] for hoarding, when the only fact I have heard stated is that they have a large amount of paper eligible for discount, and, as a matter of fact, it possibly would be very reckless banking for them to have less than they now have under the Federal reserve law, and their total loans are on ineligible paper to such an extent that they ought to be dealt with if they had less. Furthermore, I think before they should be so criticized we should know—and I do not believe it is the case to any considerable extent—whether or not they have refused loans sound and eligible for rediscount. I have heard of no information being gathered here of any official and reliable character establishing the facts which are essential to be established before I should be willing to join in the criticism that is made of the banks.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I did not intend to generalize about this matter, and I did not intend to criticize the Federal reserve system. What I did intend to say, and what I think I did say—the RECORD will show—is that some of our banks are hoarding their eligible paper. This we know to be a fact, because the reserves of these banks, which are well known in many cases, are abnormally high. I am not imputing any ulterior motives to those banks. I have nothing but charitable feeling for the banker, the individual, or the corporation who is consumed by fear.

Mr. MORRISON. I expect to address the Senate on this subject in the morning, and I desire very much to get any information the Senator has, unless a vote is to be had this evening. If so, I will not speak at all; but I really want to get any information the Senator has showing the facts about which I inquired; to wit, what proportion of the loans of these banks are in this eligible paper subject to rediscount.

The whole criticism of the country has been that the banks have loaded themselves up with too much paper ineligible for discount, and therefore the necessity of this legislation.

If that is so, and they have—as in my opinion, under the spirit of that law, almost all of them have—a small proportion of paper eligible for discount as related to their whole credits, without that information we can not know, it seems to me, whether or not they are hoarding, because I can conceive that they might have all of this paper they are talking about, and ought to have it, and they would be guilty of bad banking and but further confound the situation if they did otherwise.

I do not want to keep the Senator on his feet if he has not any information of that sort. I did not think he had; but I wanted to get in the RECORD the fact that there was not any; that the statement was based on opinion.

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. MORRISON obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. MORRISON. I understand that the Senator from Oklahoma wants but a moment to offer an amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending bill. I will ask that it be read, printed, and lie upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is so ordered, without objection.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment: On page 3, line 15, strike out the following:

For a period of not exceeding one year.

And change the first letter in line 16, page 3, to a capital "F."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MORRISON. If the Senator will give me two sentences, I will yield with pleasure.

I did not want to keep the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] on the floor any longer, and I desire to complete what I had left unfinished in my colloquy with him. The point I was trying to make when I was asking for information from the Senator was that we needed information about the matters to which I referred before we could determine whether or not these banks could safely discount this paper.

I shall be glad now to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MORRISON. I do.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to propose two amendments, and ask that they be printed and lie on the table. I ask that the amendment which I have earmarked as No. 3 be read at the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment numbered 3 will be read and, with the others, will be printed and lie on the table.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Amend Senate bill 3616, as amended, by adding at the end thereof a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. The Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by inserting a new paragraph reading as follows:

"'If any member bank to which a Federal reserve bank has made or may in the future make advances shall, immediately preceding or during the life or continuance of such advance, increase its outstanding loans made to any borrower upon collateral security, or made to the members of any organized stock exchange, investment house, or dealer in securities, upon any obligation, note, or bill, secured or unsecured, for the purpose of purchasing and/or carrying investment securities (except obligations of the United States) such advance shall be immediately due and payable, and such member bank shall be ineligible for a period of 90 days as a borrower at any reserve bank upon any and all paper: Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board shall have power from time to time in its discretion by unanimous vote of its members to suspend the provisions of this paragraph in whole or in part, whenever in its opinion the public interest shall call for such action. Each such suspension shall be for a period not exceeding 90 days and may be renewed for one additional period not exceeding 90 days during the same calendar year upon unanimous vote of the members of the board: Provided, further, That 90 days shall elapse between any periods of suspension in consecutive calendar years.'"

PLACING OF WREATH ON GRAVE OF THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. On yesterday the Senate passed House Concurrent Resolution 19, in which the word "clerk" is used instead of "secretary." It will be necessary to change it. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to and move that the House be requested to return the concurrent resolution to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to request the House to return the concurrent resolution to the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 17, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Gracious Lord, reproach us, but do not be silent toward us. We yearn for the clear assurance that we have another chance. We thank Thee for the countless mercies of Thy providence. Thou art blessed forever and blessing forever—because it is more blessed to give than to receive. Thou who art the infinite food of the universe, be Thou the bread and the water of our souls. The Blessed Lord help us to be manly, to be faithful, to be proud where we are, and each day enable us to do that which is best and wisest. Help any who may be striving against doubt and fear and any who may be confused by uncertainties and know not how to minister in their perplexities. Give us courage to stand in the radiance of the white light where moral earnestness is the resistless force of our beings. Bear to each home the blessings of good health, safety, and happiness. Run this tremendous truth into all hearts: "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away." Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a concurrent resolution of the House of the following title:

H. Con. Res. 19. Concurrent resolution providing wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington on February 22, 1932.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to a bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 1588. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for lands held under color of title.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) entitled "Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. NORRIS, Mr. BORAH, and Mr. WALSH of Montana to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ADDRESS BY HON. BURNETT M. CHIPERFIELD, PRINTED AS HOUSE DOCUMENT

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, from the Committee on Printing I report back a privileged resolution with an amendment and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina offers a privileged resolution and asks unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 145

Whereas the youth of our country need every encouragement possible, showing the advantages of our form of government, no matter how humble born they may be; and

Whereas the Lincoln day address delivered by Hon. BURNETT M. CHIPERFIELD, of Illinois, in the House of Representatives on February 12, 1932, clearly sets out what may be accomplished by a poor boy by reciting the accomplishments of Abraham Lincoln: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this address be printed as a House document for the use of the Members of the House of Representatives.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out the preamble and all after the resolving clause and insert the following:

"That the address delivered in the House of Representatives on February 12, 1932, by the Hon. BURNETT M. CHIPERFIELD, a Representative from Illinois, in commemoration of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, be printed as a House document."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state two unanimous-consent requests. First, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Indian Affairs be privileged to sit during the sessions of the House this day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow morning, following the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I may be privileged to address the House for 18 minutes.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman on what subject?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, am I required under the rules to answer the gentleman? On being required to answer, I will do so. I desire to softly discuss a subject that I have frequently discussed rather harshly heretofore—the subject of the infamous gag-rule system.

Mr. MICHENER. As now invoked in the House?

Mr. HOWARD. As now practiced, after long tutelage under the Republican organization. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances, I think I shall be obliged to object.

Mr. HOWARD. The combination is working. [Laughter.]

PLACING OF WREATH ON GRAVE OF MARY WASHINGTON

The SPEAKER. Pursuant to House Concurrent Resolution 19, the Chair appoints the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] to carry out the purposes of the resolution.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees; and when the Committee on Agriculture was called,

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution No. 292.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas calls up a House joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is on the Union Calendar; and, under the rules, the House automatically resolves into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural credit corporations, and for other purposes, with Mr. KELLER in the chair.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CORPORATIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, this is a short resolution, and I think the House would be rather informed on the subject matter if it were read. Therefore I object.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 292

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to make advances or loans to individuals, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural-credit corporations, livestock-loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks or to which such privileges may be extended.

SEC. 2. (a) No loans shall be made to individual stockholders on the capital stock of, or to create or increase the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization in an amount in excess of 75 per cent of the par value of the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization owned by or proposed to be subscribed to by such individual, nor unless such individual shall submit a credit statement (in such form as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe) which shall be verified by the investigation of the Secretary of Agriculture and shall show that such individual is not indebted in an amount in excess of one-half of the fair market value of his assets and that the value of such assets above such indebtedness shall be at least twice the value of the loan applied for; nor shall any loan be made to any individual on the capital stock of, or to create or to increase the capital stock of, any corporation devoted mainly to the financing and/or sale of special products to farmers.

(b) No loan shall be made upon the capital stock of any corporation until the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the financial structure of such corporation is sound and unimpaired and by him approved, nor shall any loan be made upon the capital stock of such corporation until the management of such company shall be made known to and approved by the Secretary, and the Secretary shall have the right at any time to declare the indebtedness to the Government that may be created hereunder due whenever in his judgment the financial structure of the corporation shall become so impaired or the management become so unsatisfactory as to jeopardize the interests of the Government.

SEC. 3. No loan or advance shall be made to any individual upon the capital stock of or to create or increase the capital stock of any corporation, unless the capital stock of such corporation shall be at least $10,000.

SEC. 4. To carry out the provisions of this resolution, including all expenses incurred thereunder, there are authorized to be appropriated, out of the unexpended balances of appropriations made to carry out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 112, Seventy-first Congress (46 Stat. 1032), as amended by the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and as amended by Public Resolution No. 120 (46 Stat. 1167), and out of the collections from loans made under Public Resolution No. 112, as so amended, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, which sum shall be paid into a revolving fund. Not to exceed 2 per cent of such fund may be used for expenses of administration. All moneys received from time to time upon the repayment of any advance or loan made pursuant to this act, together with the interest, shall be paid into the revolving fund and shall thereafter be available for the purposes and in the manner hereinbefore provided.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LUCE. The law creating intermediate credit banks was the result of a bill introduced by the Committee on Banking and Currency. My query is whether this matter has been properly referred to and considered by the Committee on Agriculture?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Agriculture having reported it out, the Chair would say that it has jurisdiction of the joint resolution. Does the gentleman make inquiry of the chairman of the committee?

Mr. LUCE. No. It is a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the Committee on Agriculture having reported the bill out, it has taken jurisdiction of the joint resolution.

The gentleman from Texas is recognized for one hour.

Is there any member of the committee in opposition to the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, simply stated, the purpose of this measure is to make available not to exceed $10,000,000 of the unexpended balances of the old drought relief measures for the purpose of assisting in the establishment of agricultural credit corporations, and for assisting in increasing the stock of existing ones, in order that those corporations may be in a position to utilize the intermediate-credit banking facilities.

It seems to me it is altogether desirable that this program be established. Provision has been made for an intermediate-credit system which would take care of the longer term credit that is needed by the livestock man and the farmer in connection with their operations. Due to a peculiar condition that has prevailed in the agricultural and livestock sections, the money has not been available for the establishment of these agricultural-credit corporations and livestock loan companies.

As everyone knows, this country has many resources. It has a great many supplies. It has both natural resources and industrial development. It has an abundance of farm commodities. But due to some peculiar practices, to discriminations and favoritism in the business practices of America, and to some economic mistakes, the agricultural sections of our land have gotten into such a condition that they can not secure the essential credits. In many places the banking facilities have ceased to function.

The prices of agricultural products are so low that the credit of both the livestock man and the farmer has been almost destroyed. It has been so nearly destroyed that we have found it necessary within the last two years to make provision for direct loans to farmers for crop production on the crop as security. I believe that every Member of the Congress regrets the necessity of establishing that program, and it is hoped, by the means which are set up in this bill, that we may encourage a sound system of credit in the agricultural and livestock sections that will at least reduce the necessity of the direct loan program that has heretofore been in vogue.

We are a Nation of moods and tenses. We seem to have cycles of booms and depressions at somewhat irregular but certain intervals. During all the periods with which most of the Members of the House have been familiar the United States Government has had almost unlimited resources. Even during the times through which we are now passing the United States Government has had practically the same resources and the same wealth it had during the great boom of 1927 and 1928.

It is a matter of distribution. We have mastered the machinery of production to a far greater degree than we have massed the machinery of distribution. According to my view, the only way we will be able to restore prosperity to the whole Nation is to restore the purchasing power of agriculture in America. [Applause.]

High interest rates have been one of the curses of the American farmer. The present commercial banking system is established primarily, or, at least it has functioned primarily, on a commercial basis, to take care of the commercial short-time loans, with renewals every 60 or 90 days, so that the farmer and livestock man, even if they can secure the credit, pay a high rate of interest. In many instances he can not secure the essential credit.

The money that is sought to be made available by this bill has already been made available for individual loans. In one of the measures which is referred to in this bill provision was made for assisting in organizing associations along similar lines to those provided for in this bill; and even though its application was limited to the drought areas, they organized 52 agricultural-credit corporations and livestock-loan companies, which furnished long-time credit at a rate of interest to the farmer of between 6 and 7 per cent. Wherever it is possible to establish that sound-basis credit I think it is desirable from the standpoint of every citizen of America. This will enable the farmers to have a system of credit that is suited to their peculiar needs. We authorize $10,000,000 to be made available out of the funds that were provided for loans to farmers under the old drought-relief program. The measure provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may lend not to exceed 75 per cent of the par value of the stock in the local agricultural credit corporation and livestock-loan companies in order to enable those individuals to purchase stock.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I do not quite understand about the reference to 75 per cent of the stock. That is not clear to me. What stock is the gentleman talking about?

Mr. JONES. I will illustrate it in this way: Suppose it is desired to organize an agricultural credit corporation or a livestock loan company with a capital of $25,000. There are 25 men who desire to put in $1,000 apiece. In that event the Secretary of Agriculture may lend to each of these men as much as $750 in order to enable them to purchase this stock and have the capital stock in the corporation available.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see that the Secretary of Agriculture has any security for that stock.

Mr. JONES. He has the stock as security. Then the gentleman understands that the entire capital stock must be invested in liquid securities and placed with the intermediate credit banks.

Mr. SNELL. Does he put that up as security, or just as stock?

Mr. JONES. The stock is security. Then the Secretary of Agriculture may require a credit statement. Then the corporate funds would be behind the value of the stock. The only way these corporations will be permitted to function will be through an intermediate credit system, which has the rediscount privileges, as the gentleman knows, and will have supervision of the paper which they rediscount. I will state to the gentleman that this is much better security than the security which is given for these same funds which may now be loaned to individual farmers. It is hoped—and I think everyone would wish to do it—that this may go as far as possible in substituting this system for the present system of direct loans, so that in the future direct loans will not be necessary, at least, except in a great emergency. If the purchasing power of agriculture had not been so greatly reduced and if its credit had not been practically destroyed, it would not have been necessary to make provision for these individual loans. This system is so much sounder, so far as security is concerned, than the system under which these same funds may be loaned directly to farmers, and for that reason it certainly should be adopted. It has the approval of the department. It has restrictions thrown around its operations in several different ways, as the gentleman knows if he has had an opportunity to read the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I have read the bill, but I am frank to say that I did not fully understand it just from reading it. The bill just came in this morning. Have we ever done anything similar to this before?

Mr. JONES. Yes; in the drought-relief program we authorized, I believe it was, not to exceed $3,000,000 or perhaps $5,000,000, to be used in this same way. Fifty-two agricultural credit corporations and livestock loan companies were established under the drought-relief program, and most of them are now functioning and functioning successfully. Of course such organizations, under that bill, were limited to the drought area. The Department of Agriculture has done fine work in handling this program.

Mr. SNELL. Did we lend money on the stock of the corporation at that time?

Mr. JONES. Exactly. We lent an average of about 72 per cent. In some instances the department, under unusual circumstances, lent 100 per cent of the stock, and the average was 72 per cent.

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. JONES. I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. FULMER. After the Secretary of Agriculture has made these loans to the extent of 75 per cent the total capital will then be invested in bonds and placed as collateral behind all of these individual loans.

Mr. JONES. Yes; I am glad my colleague has called attention to that point. When this stock is finally paid in it must be invested in bonds and put up with the intermediate credit bank against the capital stock of these local organizations and associations.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. No farmer, as I understand this proposition, who does not own stock in the Agricultural Credit Corporation can borrow any money from it?

Mr. JONES. Any farmer whose paper is acceptable may borrow money from the agricultural credit corporation, and it may be rediscounted, if it is eligible, at the intermediate credit bank. They are not limited to the organizers. They can take care of anyone in the community who can comply with their terms.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. But he has to own stock before he can borrow money on it?

Mr. JONES. The intermediate credit bank may require a small amount of stock, as they do in the intermediate credit system, but that is a matter for the intermediate credit system and not for the agricultural credit corporation. They must meet the terms of the intermediate credit bank, which, I believe, requires 5 per cent probably.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Under the present law no person can borrow a dollar from an agricultural credit corporation unless he owns some of the stock.

Mr. JONES. That is only a very small percentage of his loan and that is simply a further margin of security.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Does this bill propose that any farmer can borrow money from the agricultural credit corporation without owning stock?

Mr. JONES. This bill, I will state to the gentleman, does not undertake to amend the intermediate credit act at all. It simply provides funds for the establishment of agricultural loan corporations which, of course, must comply with the terms of the intermediate credit bank, if they function in that way.

Mr. TILSON and Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa rose.

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. Recalling the gentleman's attention to the illustration he gave a few moments ago as to how a farmer might obtain a loan of $1,000 under this resolution, I wish to see if I clearly understand him. First, some one determines that the farmer is worth, or has assets to the value of $2,000, which is double the amount of the $1,000 that he wishes to invest in one of these credit companies. With this showing he can get a loan of $750 from the Government by putting up $250 of his own, and thus he becomes the owner of $1,000 of stock in the credit corporation.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Then what does he do with the stock?

Mr. JONES. The stock, of course, is held as collateral for the Government loan until such time as it may be repaid. Then he will own it outright. The money, however, is put up with the intermediate credit system in the form of bonds that are purchased with the capital stock.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. I think the gentleman from Georgia is right when he states that under the present intermediate credit system, in order to borrow from that system you can not borrow as an individual, but you have got to form corporations, because I have gone through that matter myself, and I take it this bill is for the purpose of aiding these men who want to get together in groups; and I want to say further, in answer to questions that have been asked, there is not only the security they have by virtue of the 100 per cent that is placed in the corporation, 75 per cent of which is borrowed, but when they make these loans through the intermediate credit system, you will find out they take only the best class of security. In other words, if you have cattle that are valued on the market at $10,000, the maximum loan you can get is from 60 to 70 per cent of that valuation. This is in addition to the security of the 25 per cent that they would have in the corporation under this bill.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. I understand the purpose of the resolution is to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make loans to individuals in order that they may take stock in local agricultural credit corporations.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Why not arrange for the Secretary of Agriculture to provide proper funds to take stock in the local corporations?

Mr. JONES. It is always better, if it can be arranged on a sound basis, to have the control in the hands of local people in managing such things, because they are familiar with the credit of the community and know whose paper is good. Then you will have an interest on the part of those who own the stock to see that the investment, in a measurable degree at least, is a success.

Mr. WILSON. Suppose the local people have not got the collateral and can not put up the money.

Mr. JONES. That is exactly what we are endeavoring to do in this measure.

I want to state that under the previous loan bill two of these corporations were organized in the district which I have the honor to represent. They are both functioning now, while some of the banks are not functioning; in fact, in one place where such a corporation is functioning the banks have closed, but the Agricultural Credit Corporation is functioning and is furnishing money to the farmers and livestock men at a comparatively low rate of interest.

In this particular section, if the Secretary of Agriculture had not been authorized two years ago to do practically what is authorized here, that corporation might not have been formed, because local funds would not have been available for that purpose. If the provision had not been made, a great many people would have had to make crop-production loans, which are far less desirable than what is involved here.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. The trouble with the farmers in my district is this, that the farms are mortgaged, and they have not been able to get good prices for their crops, they have not got the money to pay the taxes. Is this intended to help them?

Mr. JONES. This does not involve the land proposition at all.

Mr. LANKFORD of Virginia. Can the farmer call on them for a loan when he needs it for producing crops?

Mr. JONES. This simply offers a means for the livestock men and farmers, who have something to offer in the way of collateral, to secure the loan. The credit corporation may apply to the intermediate credit bank, and they are authorized to make funds available by way of purchase or rediscount up to ten times the capital stock. I think six times is about as far as they ever go, but the law permits 10 to 1. These $25,000 corporations when formed may thus be able to increase the available funds through the intermediate credit bank system.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I have a request from the receiver of a bank in my district; I think he has about finished the work as receiver of the bank. This gentleman is in close touch with the agricultural conditions in his section of the district. He reports to me that many farmers who are engaged in stock raising are without funds to buy the stock and carry on their activities. He made application to the intermediate-credit bank in St. Louis to organize a local branch of the credit bank, and he says they sent him an outline for the plan and papers to organize in his local community. He winds up his request by saying that it would require $10,000. The picture is that he has not got the $10,000. How is he going to operate?

Mr. JONES. This bill authorizes a loan of three-quarters of the $10,000 to enable them to meet just such a situation as the gentleman has described. If we do not establish something like this, we will be face to face for years with the individual loan proposition on crop production, which is not a very satisfactory system, and should only be used in a great emergency.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I will.

Mr. WILSON. In this locality which I have described, where you have not the collateral to take stock in the local credit corporation, would not it be better for the Secretary of Agriculture to subscribe to the stock in the local credit bank?

Mr. JONES. Isn't this a sounder plan? They will have the local margin of interest, and as soon as the Government funds are repaid there will be entire local ownership and control. This system was suggested by the Department of Agriculture and by Mr. Wall, who has charge of the present administration. They, however, suggested 60 per cent rather than 75 per cent.

Mr. SANDLIN. They are taking 75 per cent as it is. The only question is where they are going to get the other 25 per cent.

Mr. LAMBETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. LAMBETH. I am interested in this legislation because of the acute situation in my district. Through no fault of mine, I was not in the Chamber when the gentleman from Texas explained the bill. I wish to ask this question—I have not had an opportunity to read the bill, which has just been handed to me: Does this bill create a revolving fund for the purpose of making advances or loans to individuals, under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural credit corporations, livestock loan companies, or like organizations, as are now or hereafter may be qualified to do business with the Federal intermediate credit bank?

Mr. JONES. That is correct. That is, it transfers a portion of the old drought-relief fund to a revolving fund for that purpose.

Mr. LAMBETH. In other words, this bill has the same effect as the bill introduced by Senator GEORGE, if I understand correctly?

Mr. JONES. They are along very similar lines.

Mr. LAMBETH. Under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act limiting the loans, as I understand, the limit to any farmer or any landowner is $1,600, or four tenants borrowing $400 each. In my State we have many large landowners, particularly in the cotton-producing counties, who operate from 5 to 100 plows. This is the only place where they can get credit to-day. In Raleigh we have the Growers Agricultural Credit Corporation, which has been functioning successfully for more than a year, and it is to get relief for that situation that I am making this inquiry.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. That is what we are endeavoring to do here. We are simply endeavoring to establish a sound system of credit that can take the place of an unsound system.

I regret that I must reserve the balance of my time, because some others want to be heard.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition for one hour.

I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE].

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, my knowledge of this bill began when it was laid before us a few minutes ago, and I may not address myself to details with any confidence, but the fortune that has enabled me to be a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency for a dozen years allows me to see the core of the bill and ask the attention of the House while I point out that this is the most dangerous proposition, in my judgment, that has been laid before the House in my term of service.

It is a proposal that ought to have had the consideration of the Committee on Banking and Currency, for it was that committee which created the Federal farm loan system and the intermediate credit banks. I mean no unkind stricture when I expostulate at the course of another committee in thus usurping the province of the committee which in part exists in order to consider this class of proposals. It is certainly a weakness in our parliamentary system that there may be brought before us from a committee that could not have been expected to ask this privilege, the consideration of so serious a measure.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. This bill does not undertake to amend the intermediate credit bank act. Does the gentleman think that his committee should have jurisdiction of a measure which simply provides for lending money to certain groups for the purpose of organizing a corporation that is authorized by a measure presented by the gentleman's committee?

Mr. LUCE. Absolutely. It is before the House improperly, but I have no remedy, and I must address myself, therefore, to the principles of the bill.

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that the same matter was handled by this committee two years ago.

Mr. LUCE. It was then handled improperly, if that were the case.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. LUCE. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. In regard to the matter that was before the House two years ago, as I understand, it was simply an emergency proposition, but, as I understand from a cursory reading of this bill, this is setting up a financial system that will be in vogue for years. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that it is a matter that should go properly to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. JONES. In view of the statement made heretofore, I will state that, in my judgment, the whole intermediate credit system should have gone to the Committee on Agriculture, and that the reference to the gentleman's committee was wrong in the first place.

Mr. LUCE. Regretting that I can not agree with the gentleman as to the parliamentary situation and regretting that our system of parliamentary procedure permits us thus to be taken unawares, without opportunity for considering whether this should have gone to the committee that created the system involved, let me go to the core of the matter. From 90 to 95 per cent of our work here consists in developing policies established for the most part long ago. It is hardly once in a session that there is laid before us a proposal for an absolutely new policy. If this bill becomes law, it will be the first time, as far as I am aware, that we shall have committed ourselves to a permanent policy of furnishing money to individuals to buy stock in corporations. As a temporary matter, this may have been done, but not without time limitation. The camel is putting his nose under the tent.

Yesterday, in an address that deserves the perusal of every Member of the House who did not hear it——

Mr. JONES. Did we not do that in connection with both the Federal reserve system and the Federal land-bank system? Did not the Government advance the money for the stock in both of those propositions?

Mr. LUCE. I am not aware that the Government ever furnished a dollar to any individual to buy stock in the corporations mentioned.

Mr. JONES. Well, the Government bought the stock outright, which is even going farther.

Mr. LUCE. Oh, I can not discuss such sophistries. I desire to address myself to the fact that this is the first time it has been proposed that the United States of America shall lend to individual citizens money with which to buy stock in corporations other than for temporary purposes under emergency conditions.

If I may complete the sentence which I started, yesterday there was delivered in this House an address by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] which deserves the perusal of every man who did not hear it. He pointed out that in the last 10 years we have increased the running expenses of this Government by $1,000,000,000 a year; in that time we have increased the number of persons on the pay roll by 68,000, all in the development of ideas like this, which began with seeming harmlessness, that were of a temporary nature, perchance, or were never expected to develop into what gentlemen now characterize as a monstrous extension of the scope of government.

I point out in all kindness that this proposition comes from the side of the House whose principles from the time of Thomas Jefferson have all been contrary to such an idea as that of financing individuals to buy stock in corporations.

Now, what will follow? Gentlemen will say this proposal concerns activities clothed with a public interest. It is frequently brought to our attention that agriculture is the mainstay of the country. Here again I do not desire to discuss whether the brain, the heart, or the lungs are more important to the body, but I point out that if you lend money to men engaged in agriculture in order to enable them to buy stocks in corporations you will be confronted next with the proposal that the same thing be done for other lines of activity.

Let me illustrate. There is no industry, if I may call it that, no activity in this country that to-day bids fair to be more important in the long run than that of gold mining. Looking beyond the moment of depression and following the economists who are studying these subjects you may find that 10 years from now the supply of gold will be the most important thing not only to this country but to the whole world. Therefore it may properly be urged that gold mining is clothed with a public interest, and it may then be properly urged that it is the duty of Congress to furnish money to individuals with which to form gold-mining companies in order that they may supply us with a prime necessity of commerce and business. Then Congress may be called upon to follow that to other lines of activity. One after another the various groups or sections of this country interested in this or that line of endeavor will come before us and say that the welfare of the country is concerned, and that we can only advance the welfare of the country by helping the welfare of this or that activity and we ought to do it by furnishing money to individuals to form corporations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. LUCE. I am not prepared to say, sir, that as the years pass this sort of thing may not come to be thought a proper function of government.

"The world advances and in time outgrows the laws that in our father's day were best." Perhaps a hundred years from now we shall find all business centralized in Washington, if this Nation still endures, though it is difficult to see how it can endure under such a system. However, a hundred years from now we may find the Public Treasury used to finance every citizen who wants to work. A man will come here and say that what he produces is for the welfare of the United States. "I can only produce it if you will finance me, if you will lend me the money with which to form a corporation."

The logic of the thing brings us to a state of affairs that even in Russia is not more fully achieved. Nothing can be more sovietistical, if I may coin the word, than a policy of financing individuals in all their lines of endeavor.

Do we want to go in that direction? Perhaps we do. Perhaps gentlemen from the farming districts will say it is time to engage in such a program, but if they do say that, they ought to form a new political party. They ought to forget all memory of Thomas Jefferson. They ought to desert the banner under which they and their predecessors have marched so bravely and happily through a century and more. They ought to throw overboard the idea upon which we have based our prosperity, the idea that the individual should be left to work out his own salvation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, out of the hour at my disposal I ask for recognition for 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, when the chairman of the committee stated that this principle had been heretofore recognized by legislative enactment I was astounded, for I do not recall when the proposal involved in this bill was ever under consideration in a prior Congress. Certainly never in the history of this Government have we launched upon the sovietized idea of the Government loaning money to individuals with which to purchase stock in private corporations, to purchase stock to the amount of 75 per cent of the face value of that stock. That privilege is to be accorded to a certain class of our people which does not have a greater indebtedness on its property than 50 per cent, subject, however, under the terms of the bill, that there shall be an investigation to see whether the individual might have theretofore borrowed more than 50 per cent of the value of his property. Upon this bare showing and nothing more an individual will be privileged to get a loan to the extent of 75 per cent of the face value of the stock, to be invested in the stock of a private corporation that is to be formed.

This is the wholesale appropriation of the people's money without any security whatever—no lien on the stock to be issued, nothing but a gift to an individual to be invested in a certificate of stock of a certain prescribed kind of private corporation. This Government has become an eleemosynary institution for a certain mortgaged class who is without property to secure a private loan, which the Government extends as a generous Santa Claus.

If we launch into this policy, why, there is every conceivable character of private endeavor where we will be asked to allow Uncle Sam's Treasury to be opened to individuals to buy stock in private corporations under certain terms.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman think it is going any further to make loans to individuals than it is to do what we did under the $2,000,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation act in lending to corporations and banks and insurance companies?

Mr. STAFFORD. Ah, there we authorized loans as a temporary means to palliate existing conditions to corporations that could furnish adequate security, to corporations that are established, mostly to banking institutions throughout the country, to merely aid them in this depression by extending additional credit. There you have capital and you have back of it all the assets of these great institutions. Here you are seeking to lend money to the individual, without any security whatsoever; advancing Government money to be invested by him in the purchase of capital stock in a private corporation.

Mr. JONES. But in that instance the Government guarantees the stock and bonds up to $2,000,000,000 and pays any loss.

Mr. STAFFORD. The Government does not guarantee it. It is the banks and the individuals to whom the money is lent. The gentleman can take his time to explain that.

Mr. JONES. All right.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the bank that guarantees the loan, it is the railroad that guarantees the repayment of the loan, and they have to furnish adequate security against the loans that are made.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit another question, and then I shall not bother him again?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask the gentleman this question and allow him time to answer it: When was such a proposal ever considered before on the floor of the House?

Mr. JONES. This same proposition was considered two years ago in the consideration of the drought-relief program.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was never considered.

Mr. JONES. And there are 52 functioning agricultural credit corporations and livestock loan companies to-day under that authorization.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was never before considered on the floor of the House, never considered before in debate, and, mark you, gentlemen, never in the history of the Government has there ever been a direct legislative enactment authorizing loans of money from the Treasury to individuals, and in this instance to do what? To form a private corporation; and what more? We have here a report that has not even got any recommendation from the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman permit me to call his attention to the law——

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read that. It was called to my attention a moment ago, and what does that law provide? It was not considered on the floor of the House. It was not given any consideration. What does that law provide? The act of February 14, 1931, I believe the gentleman is referring to.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was just a year ago. The whole phraseology of that law shows that it was temporary in its character, just for the time being, and the very last sentence of that law says:

> The advances in loans made pursuant to this act and amendments thereto shall be secured by liens on crops or by other security.

This was carrying out the fundamental idea of the loan act, that when loans were to be made to these farmers for seed, for gasoline, and for feed, we would take a lien on the existing crops. I do not recall how many years ago it was when the Government first launched on this policy of making loans direct to farmers for the purchase of seed. It was to afford relief to the farmers in the drought-stricken area of North Dakota. Uncle Joe Cannon, of favorable memory, rose on the floor of the House and attacked it as being socialistic in its tendency. We have seen that little seed grow from year to year until the last Congress we voted $20,000,000, and this Congress in the $500,000,000 Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure we authorized $200,000,000 and more to be loaned to the farmers of the country for the same purpose—to purchase seed, to purchase feed, and to purchase gasoline, to be secured by a lien on the crops; and the testimony shows that about 80 per cent, if I am liberal, of the funds that had been loaned under prior acts had been returned to the Treasury.

But here you are establishing a policy of having Uncle Sam furnish money direct to individuals. If you are warranted in furnishing money direct to individuals to form a private corporation or to buy certificates of stock, why, then, we will be in the same position and have a precedent to haunt us so that every private merchant who is in distress will have the privilege of coming to Uncle Sam and asking that Uncle Sam's money be used to purchase shares of stock to form private corporations. Every home dweller and every member of building and loan associations would have an equal right under the same conditions to come here and say, "I am in distress; I am out of work; I need money, and my home is going"; or to take the counterposition, "I need money to build a home." We are all in favor of a country of home owners, and they would say, "I have got a little piece of land over here on which there is no mortgage"—but under this law he could have a mortgage of 50 per cent—"let me have a loan to the extent of 75 per cent of the value of my equity so I can go and buy building-and-loan stock."

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The gentleman referred to socialism. I would like to know whether or not this bill, authorizing loans to organizations and to relieve individuals in distress, would more likely lead to socialism and open the door to the Treasury of the United States than the relief to great corporations, who, as the result of their own mistakes, were about to become victims of their own folly?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I have to differ with the gentleman's premise, that the condition of these corporations has been brought about by their own acts. They are merely the creatures, like individuals, of an unfortunate situation. I believe, fundamentally, that the various localities throughout the country, the individual localities, the individual States, should look after the destitute within their borders, and Wisconsin is not coming to the National Congress and asking for public relief. My State is meeting that condition by taxing our own people, doubling the income tax, like the State of New York has doubled its income tax, and providing funds to meet the individual condition. I am not in favor of every little locality shifting its responsibilities to meet the conditions prevailing there upon the shoulders of people in other places who are sharing and meeting the burdens of their own communities.

Mr. CHRISTGAU. Did we not adopt a similar system in the establishment of the Federal land banks, when we loaned money to the individual farmers? This is merely a short-term credit, and providing the machinery for it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the Federal farm loan act we established some 12 Federal land banks, with $750,000 capital each, or a total of $9,000,000, and they were scattered in different sections of the country, and we authorized that loans should be made to individuals and organizations on acceptable security. Some of that money was to be contributed by the National Government and other money by private stockholders. Then later on we established intermediate-credit banks, under which the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to purchase some of the stock, and the balance of the stock was authorized to be purchased by the individual and farm organizations. But nowhere, at no time in the history of this Congress, have we ever authorized public funds to be advanced to individuals for the purchase of shares of stock in private corporations.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I think I am familiar with all of the seed loans, and at that time the proponents of those acts simply said it was an emergency act and would not establish a precedent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, they have always been emergency loans, terminating at the end of the year, and if the conditions continued they would be extended for another year; but in no case has the loan been for more than two years.

Mr. SNELL. And the same people who said that it should not establish a precedent are now citing it as a precedent for loaning money to individuals.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; but they are out-Heroding Herod in their rapacity to get at public moneys. There is nothing in the bill that limits these provisions. It is for all time. It is a permanent policy of this Government that public funds shall be loaned to private individuals to purchase stock in a private corporation.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman, and that matter has not been before Congress before.

Mr. STAFFORD. It never has been considered at any time, and I challenge any gentleman on either side of the aisle to cite one line of discussion on the floor of the House where this principle was ever under discussion.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman spoke of the possibility of helping people in distress. I call the attention of the committee and the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is not a word in here about distress, and that there is not a word here that prevents a man from borrowing $75,000, if he chooses, in order to buy $100,000 of stock, if he wants to put up the other $25,000. It is not limited to the poor man; it is not limited to the man in distress; it has no limit—the sky is the limit.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not limited to the poor man; it is limited to the man who has land, it is to permit loans to the landed gentry of the country, such landed gentry as have 50 per cent of mortgage on their property, and you are going to allow them an additional loan, not secured by a lien on the crops, with no security at all, to 50 per cent of the estimated equity.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Between the method, however, of continuing these seed loans and the establishment of some permanent policy of this kind, granting that we will continue to make seed loans, is not this method preferable to the other?

Mr. STAFFORD. By no means. I bottom my opposition on principle. I am no ephemeral opportunist advocating here a policy that is opposed to the fundamental principles of my Government. No; a thousand times no; because the loan principle is not going to persist for all time. God forbid that the farmers of the country are always going to be in this prostrate condition. The industrialists, the workers of the country, the little storekeepers, are just as much embarrassed at the present time as are the farmers. In my State the farmers are better off than the industrialists. In Wisconsin the farmers are generally in a fair condition. It is generally accepted that there is not much destitution in the farming districts of Wisconsin. That is the report of the survey made by the State government.

The destitution is in our industrial centers. This bill would launch the Government for all time on the policy of allowing loans to individuals to be invested in private capital stock, and I say right here and now without any security whatsoever, because what is the security we are getting to the amount of 50 per cent of the value of an equity, when 50 per cent has already been mortgaged on the property?

Mr. FULMER. Will the gentleman permit me to tell him about the securities?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman has had his time. My time is occupied.

Now, I am not going into a discussion of the intermediate credit banks, farm-loan banks, and joint-stock land banks. We went pretty far at the close of the war in loaning funds of the Government to come to the relief of the farmers by creating these instrumentalities. It was represented that the mortgage bankers in the agricultural South and West were charging 8 per cent, 10 per cent, and 12 per cent for mortgage loans.

We established these Government agencies whereby the interest rates on such loans have been cut down to 5½ and 6 per cent, and it was on that idea that I subscribed to and voted for the establishment of those agencies, so that the local mortgage bankers of those localities would not hold up the farmers. Those agencies have proved efficacious in cutting down the outrageously high mortgage interest rates that were charged prior to the establishment of those agencies.

Mr. Chairman, I view with great alarm any bill such as this being incorporated on the statute books. I have served here long enough to know the danger of precedent. Once establish this proposal, and there is no hope whatsoever for our adhering to the fundamental Jeffersonian principle of having the Government keep out of business. We are launching right into the individual's affairs—agriculture in this instance, industrial in the next, and commercial in the next. I regret that this bill is in such broad terms that it will establish a policy that will come to haunt us not only to-day but in future years of the Government. Let us hold fast to the principles on which our Government was founded, against using the trust funds of the Government for the private venture of the individual.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM].

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, one hesitates to take the floor after the very scholarly address made by our distinguished colleague the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and attempt to argue a proposition in the field of legislation to which the gentleman has given his attention for the last 10 years. I am not now undertaking to launch myself into that field with any hope that I shall be able to cope with the gentleman, but I do want to make this frank statement before the committee, that in my humble judgment the difficulties the gentleman believes we are entering upon and the fears with which the gentleman views our entrance into this field, it seems, are answered by the one fact that can answer it, that is, the actual success of organizations of this kind that have been set up with the very careful supervision that has been given them by one of the keenest young departmental men I have had the opportunity to observe in a long time.

Time after time during the debate upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation proposition we heard it echoed around this hall that the sum total of the benefits of this particular proposition, the success or failure of it, will depend upon the men who are to administer it. I am here to say to my friend the gentleman from Massachusetts, who on matters of government is so upright, that upon frequent occasions he leans over backward, I would leave it to him, with his discriminating and rare judgment and fine erudition and great eloquence and all the other qualities that we admire in him so much, as to whether the gentleman in charge of this particular activity would insure complete confidence and whether there was any danger in adopting or making use of this principle, or in its actual operation, as far as bringing benefits to those whom it was desired to aid was concerned.

I simply make that statement because I believe in making it I would have the support of every member of the committee who has had an opportunity to observe this young man and who know his qualities.

Now, in response to my good friend the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who is always here when agriculture is under consideration, I would say that I am surprised to know that the gentleman, the watchdog not only of the Treasury but of legislation, will stand on this floor and admit that in February, 1931, a proposition of this kind passed the House without the gentleman's eagle eye resting thereon.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman cite one line of that act where it states we are authorized to loan money to individuals to buy stock?

Mr. KETCHAM. I do not have the act before me.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will furnish it to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. The first part of the second paragraph covers exactly the same proposition. There is not a whit of difference.

Mr. KETCHAM. I read this language:

> In addition to the sums herein authorized and appropriations made thereunder, there is hereby appropriated to be immediately available out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000,000 to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the following purposes: To make advances or loans to individuals in the drought or storm-stricken areas, or for the purpose of assisting in forming local agriculture credit corporations.

Now, that is a loan to individuals for the distinct purpose embodied in this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is not a word about authorizing a loan to an individual to purchase stock and take stock security.

Mr. KETCHAM. Now, members of the committee, I just leave it to you whether or not the loaning of money to individuals to assist them in forming corporations is not identically the same in form and meaning as the language incorporated in this bill?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. The language of the present bill and the language of the bill which the gentleman read is not only similar but it is identical, word for word.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Under this resolution, if it should become law, would it be possible for a group of farmers who desired, for instance, to buy dairy cattle to secure a loan up to 75 per cent, and form an association in order that they might borrow from the intermediate credit banks?

Mr. KETCHAM. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. And it would enable the farmers to form that sort of corporation?

Mr. KETCHAM. Exactly.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. I yield.

Mr. HARE. I am sympathetic toward this legislation, but I want to ask for information. Suppose the gentleman and I were farmers and the gentleman were to furnish $25,000?

Mr. KETCHAM. Oh, that is too much.

Mr. HARE. Well, we will make a supposition, contrary to fact. And suppose I were to furnish $25,000. That would make $50,000. Under the provisions of this act we would be entitled to borrow $150,000 and set up an agricultural credit corporation of $200,000. Is that correct?

Mr. KETCHAM. I so understand it.

Mr. HARE. I want information, and I want this made clear. That is the way I interpret the bill.

If an individual or two or three individuals or more individuals put up 25 per cent of the proposed stock, then under this act the Secretary of Agriculture will loan the other 75 per cent.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. HARE. What I wanted to get at is this: Under the illustration I gave, if you and I formed this agricultural credit corporation, then we would in effect have a banking institution, and I think that will facilitate the loaning of money to individual farmers, but I am just wondering whether or not somebody, not you and I, who would have the $25,000 each, would set up an organization of that kind and establish a banking institution in competition with others.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am glad the gentleman asked that question because that matter came within the purview of the committee a number of times. The set-up of these organizations not only adds to the number of subscriptions and the character of the security that is behind the amount of money that may be loaned but as to the whole management of it is very carefully safeguarded and has been worked out by very good rules and regulations, and I think they have been and will be very capably administered. May I say further to the gentleman that it developed that in the earlier days, when these matters were not so carefully safeguarded, some condition like that indicated by the gentleman developed, and the care in drafting this language and the regulations now provided are intended to offset and prevent a recurrence of that very thing.

Mr. HARE. Then there would be no opportunity for you and me, under the illustration given, to exploit the farmers in the community in which we were dealing?

Mr. KETCHAM. The opposite is the intention and the plan, and I think it is very carefully safeguarded both in the legislation and its administration.

Mr. BURTNESS. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. KETCHAM. It has. Now, may I say that this legislation comes in as emergency legislation. The gentleman referred to the seed loans as emergency legislation. Indeed, they were; but, my friends, no one around this Chamber this afternoon who claims to have any knowledge of the agricultural situation will dispute the fact that the present agriculture-credit distress is far more serious than it was when these seed loans were made. So, friends, there can be no manner of question but what this particular agency is very much desired at this time. With reference to the other emergency legislation—the seed loan legislation—may I say that this is designed to be used instead and as a sort of buffer against any undue expansion of the seed-loan proposition, which, as the chairman has so well said, has led us into considerable difficulty. Back of these corporations there is to be the best of security, namely, the assets of the men themselves who subscribe for this stock, and that is very carefully safeguarded.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman two additional minutes.

Mr. KETCHAM. May I say, in conclusion, gentlemen, that the evidence before the committee indicated that in certain particular sections of the country, where certain lines of agricultural activity are followed, which do not terminate with the seasons, but which run into a range of two or three years—and particularly is that true of the livestock industry—this particular agency has been of great help.

I am not going to plead for the passage of this bill because it will be of any particular value to my State. I think there is no agricultural credit corporation set up in my home community. It was called to their attention, but they did not seem to care to avail themselves of it; but I do know from the evidence presented that it did render splendid service in other regions.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KETCHAM. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In section 3 it is provided that—

> No loan or advance shall be made to any individual upon the capital stock of or to create or increase the capital stock of any corporation, unless the capital stock of such corporation shall be at least $10,000.

That means paid-in capital stock.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is paid-in capital stock. The original capital was $25,000, but it was believed it would be better to reduce it to $10,000.

Mr. SNELL. That does not mean authorized capital stock to that amount and $500 paid in?

Mr. KETCHAM. No. I submit, gentlemen, this measure, as alarming as it appears to some Members of the House, has the unanimous support of the Committee on Agriculture. We have been voting literally millions, and running into the billions of dollars, for assistance in other avenues of industry in the United States, so certainly we ought not to feel that the setting aside of $10,000,000, involving no new appropriations, but appropriations that have been repaid, should be used for this activity. It certainly seems we ought not to feel we are endangering the credit of the United States or that we are entering into any new, astonishing or dangerous proposition. I certainly hope the measure will have very large support.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, a few minutes ago, my good friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] stated that this was a very unusual bill. I want to state to my friend that within the past few weeks we have passed a good many very unusual bills. In connection with the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], I hope the committee will not take his objection very seriously. The gentleman is usually so busy in looking after adequate tariff rates for industry in the New England States and giving his time to the authorization of appropriations to be loaned to railroads, banks, and building associations that about all the time and aid he has to give the farmers is to extend to them his sympathy.

There has been something said as to the collateral in connection with these loans. I want to say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that out of all of the bills you have passed recently wherein you propose to loan millions there will be no industry or bank able to put up better collateral than we will have under this set-up. For instance, you take a corporation of $25,000. Seventy-five per cent of it will be loaned by the Secretary of Agriculture to farmers to pay for stock, and the stockholders will put in 25 per cent. The total capital of $25,000 will be invested in bonds and turned over to the Secretary of Agriculture as collateral for the whole of the 75 per cent and, therefore, there is no possible chance of a single loss in connection with these loans.

I want to say also to the committee that this is a piece of emergency legislation, and unless you do something in this Congress to set up proper machinery to give the agricultural interests of the country production credit, you are going to have to continue making seed loans which to my way of thinking are very unsound and very unsatisfactory.

I happened to have worked with the Secretary of Agriculture last year in setting up one of these associations, and I may say to the members of the committee that you need not be uneasy as to how many stockholders will be required to come in or as to the type of officials in these organizations, because the Secretary of Agriculture has full power and full control in either accepting or rejecting applications for loans and the set-up of these associations.

I want to say to my good friend from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] the trouble about the associations in my State and the associations in his State is that they were set up under the immediate credit bank act which was passed by the Congress, largely and in most every instance by speculators who organized for the purpose of selling fertilizer and making profits, and they did rob the agricultural interests of your State and of my State, and these associations were absolute failures. Under this set-up, with the safeguards and with the administration largely in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, farmers will not have such treatment and they should be successful.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULMER. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. As I understand the bill, under section 2 if a farmer has a $20,000 farm and has liabilities to the extent of $11,000, or over one-half of the value of his farm, he is not eligible for a loan, although he may have a $9,000 equity in that farm; is that correct?

Mr. FULMER. He would be eligible for a loan because of the largeness of his equity in the farm.

Mr. BOILEAU. The section states that a credit statement must show that the individual is not indebted in an amount in excess of one-half of the fair market value of his assets.

Mr. FULMER. May I state to the gentleman that that will be passed upon by the Secretary of Agriculture, and the type of man making application for the loan, as well as his resources, will have quite a lot to do with it?

Mr. BOILEAU. It seems to me the language clearly prohibits any such loan if the debts are more than one-half the fair market value of his assets.

Mr. FULMER. I would like to state to the committee that I believe one reason that these associations have failed and have not functioned properly in the past is because the intermediate-credit banks are under the jurisdiction of the Federal Farm Loan Board. I believe they should be under some other department of the Government more interested and more closely in touch with agriculture. I have a bill pending now before the Banking and Currency Committee proposing to transfer the activities of the Farm Loan Board, as they relate to the intermediate-credit banks, to the Department of Agriculture, where they can be properly and sympathetically administered.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GLOVER].

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] have found this to be such a dangerous piece of legislation in so short a time. We have 23 members on the Committee on Agriculture. We had hearings before the committee. We had representatives of the Department of Agriculture before us asking for the legislation, and it is very strange that the Department of Agriculture, with the aid of the committee, could not find any danger in this piece of legislation after a careful study of the matter. The truth is there is no danger in it whatever.

We have in my State a similar proposition which was set up last year, and I called your attention to the fact on the floor of the House that when we were seeking aid in our State during the drought, we borrowed in that State about $10,000,000 from the Government, but this was not sufficient to meet our needs. The State legislature passed an act to set up a similar corporation to this one that could extend loans, and they set up, in connection with an intermediate credit bank in St. Louis, an agency, and they loaned $9,000,000 additional money in the State last year. I saw a statement in the Arkansas Gazette last week, and you perchance saw it here on the rack, that every dollar of that $9,000,000 was paid back, and that they had tendered them this year, under the same plan, $12,000,000 worth of credit.

This is the right kind of legislation. It hits the spot. Let me tell you another thing. I never had a clearer demonstration in my life of the need of direct contact with the farmer to give him aid than what we learned from the lesson we had last year in lending him money. I want to say to you that if you can reach him with credit at a low rate of interest, you are doing more for agriculture than you will be able to do in almost any other way.

Another thing that this bill does is this. There are many communities in the United States which have no bank to which they can go for credit or to get a loan; they have no means of getting credit. They have agriculture there and they have men who are financially able to set up a corporation of this kind, and 10 of them can take $1,000 each and set up one of these associations and receive a loan and then they can finance themselves.

This is to help the farmer and to take some tension off the little banks that you and I know are struggling to keep their heads above water. It will aid them, and it will aid agriculture.

I want to say to you that we have passed several measures looking to the relief of the conditions that we have; but when you get under agriculture, to raise it where it ought to be, you will give credit back to the banks, make business for the railroads, and start the wheels of progress. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLOVER. Yes.

Mr. MAY. I am for everything that will aid the farmer. When I have considered this resolution I will probably be for this; but the gentleman has said that the farmers obtained last year $10,000,000 in loans. I assume that they obtained those loans from the Federal land banks.

Mr. GLOVER. No; they obtained it direct as a part of the drought-relief fund.

Mr. MAY. How did they obtain it directly?

Mr. GLOVER. Direct to the individual himself; and about 90 per cent of that has been paid back.

Mr. MAY. Would it not be better to extend the power and privileges to the farm loan banks?

Mr. GLOVER. No; I want it extended directly to the farmers, where they will not waste so much of it in getting it to him. I want it to go directly to him at a low rate of interest.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin said that he viewed with alarm the provisions as set out in this bill. I wish to say to the ladies and gentlemen of this House that it is time we viewed with alarm some of the conditions that exist, not only in the whole country but especially the conditions in regard to agriculture.

I have only a few minutes to speak, and I do not want to spend much time telling you of conditions in my part of the country.

In 1924 we had 13 banks in my community to take care of the financing of the farmers. To-day, out of those 13 banks, there are 11 banks left. The deposits, which were generally distributed in farm loans, have been reduced to less than one-third.

Now, something has got to be done. I have assisted in the liquidation of several banks. To-day farmers are asking me where will they get the money to finance and carry out their operations.

In other words, the banks have a chattel mortgage—banks that are in liquidation now have chattel mortgages—on the personal property used in the operation of the farm.

The question comes, as I said before, Where are you going to get the money? When the banks are closed, when they are in liquidation, where can the farmers get the money? You know and I know that when it comes to agricultural industry it involves the livelihood of over 30,000,000 people and is the very foundation, as has been said on this floor, of our very civilization.

I say to you, and I say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, that I do view with alarm—not the provisions of this bill, as much as the conditions that exist out there.

How will this help? In the first place, $2,500, with the $7,500, is money enough to take care of these men and women out there who are engaged in the farming industry. I say to you that I went further than I ever supposed I would go, when I voted for the reconstruction bill, when I voted for all these measures that came from the White House and through the Democratic organization, to keep this country on its feet.

Now, to-day, for the first time in the present Congress, you have got down to the very meat of the situation, when you are doing something for the benefit of the farmers. I think of all the bills that have come up here, this bill goes to the very foundation of helping out the country in this crisis.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I see in the report that the measure does not require any new appropriation, that there is $10,000,000 of unexpended balance of the drought-relief money. I had a talk with the Secretary of Agriculture about a week ago and he said that that figure was $7,000,000, and at that time they had opened up this $7,000,000 for some other relief in the Middle West, particularly in the northern part of Nebraska. A good deal of that has been taken away from this figure of $10,000,000, and it must have been greatly reduced.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. As far as the provisions of the bill are concerned, I think the gentleman better address that question to the chairman of the committee or to a member of the committee. I am like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. The first I knew of this bill was when it first came up. If gentlemen will read from line 20 to line 24 they will find that the regulations are very strict that surround the organization of these companies, and the loans to be made to these companies are all supervised through the Secretary of Agriculture. If he feels it is being mismanaged, if he feels that the loans are not of the right kind, he can immediately call in the loan that he has made. Every safeguard in the world surrounds the formation of these organizations, and they are good regulations at that. I certainly hope that all bills that we have passed here will have the support of the Members of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS.]

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that we need discuss the necessities for a loan agency of this kind. One has been in successful operation for a good while. The representatives of the Department of Agriculture on a direct question from myself said that they had gone as far as they could and that they needed additional capital to proceed along this line. If the activities of the intermediate credit banks should stop right now, at a time when a large number of men need credit, I think it would be a very serious handicap. My boy was in Chicago last week with cattle. He writes me about men being there, men whose credit is good, with cattle that they had bought at from 8 to 9 cents a pound a year ago which they were selling at from 5 to 7½ cents a pound. Ordinarily a man feeds cattle on borrowed capital. These men will have to go back and make up the loss which they have sustained this year, and unless credit is given to them they will either have to suspend operations or else find some other means of credit. In some sections of the country that means the credit is all gone, and will be gone unless we provide means like this so that they may receive credit. If they have reached their limit and can not function any further, then we have either got to stop that activity and handicap those particular agriculture activities or else make the appropriation to continue. I have not heard it charged by anybody that the intermediate credit bank operations have been unsound or that we have suffered any great losses by reason of those operations. I do not suppose we will ourselves want credit in our neighborhood, because we have credit facilities there. Take the matter of corn. Nobody wants to sell corn at the price that is offered now, and under our warehouse act we have had the sealer seal the corn, and in the intermediate credit bank a good many dollars were borrowed on as good security as there is in the world. A man is not allowed to touch that corn until he does sell it. That enables a man to wait until he can see whether the market reacts to his advantage, so that he may not be compelled to sell his corn at less than the cost of production. These activities of agriculture must either cease in certain sections of the country or we must make this appropriation in localities where there is no likelihood of their having any credit for the next 12 or 15 months. I would not myself go into a credit organization when I could get credit some place else, but there are many communities where they are entirely without credit facilities. This seems to meet the situation. This seems to be where the farmers can get together and, through this agency, procure the means to carry on their business operations. Otherwise, if they have reached the end of their facilities, as they say they have, the activity must stop. Each locality must cease to function except on what resources they have, and in such localities where the banks have failed their resources are very limited. Our livestock farmers in many localities will avail themselves of this means of credit. Many of them will have to cease their operation during the next year. Now, that means something to everybody. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remaining time on my side to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. FULBRIGHT].

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I desire to say that I do not want to be understood as an enemy of big business. I believe in big business, honestly conducted and efficiently managed, and I believe in giving the same consideration to individuals as is given to corporations.

I was very much impressed a few moments ago by the remarks of my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. On different occasions I have heard the gentleman speak on the floor of this House. Invariably when the big business interests of the country are at stake, the gentleman from Massachusetts rushes to their assistance, but in all the remarks of the gentleman to which I have listened, I have never heard a word that carried a ray of sympathy for the common man. We are justified in coming to the relief of the business interests of the country in this emergency, but we ought not forget that the common people ought also to receive some consideration in a great republic like this, and to this class the farmer belongs. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks made yesterday by the distinguished gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], and the suggestion of the introduction of a resolution by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] relative to reorganization of the administrative departments of the Government, I want to refer to that matter for just a moment.

With a deep appreciation of the need for a careful and specialized study of the entire problem of reorganization of the Federal Government, and with special consideration of the functions, responsibilities, and activities of every establishment, I introduced February 1, 1932, H. R. 8690 to establish a survey board for the purpose of making a survey to determine what action should be taken to increase efficiency and reduce the costs of administration, with respect to (1) eliminating useless boards, bureaus, commissions, and other agencies; (2) merging or consolidating boards, bureaus, commissions, or other agencies whose functions are related, overlapping, or duplicating; and (3) modernizing, systematizing, and standardizing the departments and agencies of the Federal Government.

This bill proposes that this survey board shall consist of five members, four of whom shall be appointed from among individuals not in the service of the United States Government who are political economists of outstanding ability, the chief of the bureau of efficiency to be ex officio chairman. I understand the resolutions to which I have referred provide for a committee composed of Members of Congress to do this work. If the results sought can be secured more quickly, I shall be heartily in accord with that procedure.

I realize that if a survey and recommendations to Congress be made only to be brushed aside and disregarded this legislation would avail nothing, and the same unscientific, slipshod methods would continue, with consequent waste and extravagance. However, if the intent and purpose of this legislation is realized, it will be an economy measure of first magnitude. No person who is familiar, even in a general way, with the administration of the affairs of government has the slightest doubt but that if useless boards, bureaus, commissions, and other such governmental agencies were eliminated and related, overlapping and duplicating functions were consolidated, it would substantially reduce the costs of government and mean a saving to the taxpayers of the country of hundreds of millions of dollars annually and at the same time increase efficiency and improve the service. The application of the practical principles of private business in the affairs of government would save millions annually to the taxpayers, whereas the application of our present methods in private business would force them into bankruptcy within a few years even in normal times.

In every campaign for many years candidates for Congress of both major parties have declared against useless boards, bureaus, and commissions and the duplication of governmental functions. Candidates for the Presidency of both major parties have likewise expressed their views in pronouncements equally as definite. Platform declarations of both major parties have repeatedly condemned this situation and pledged the respective parties to needed reform.

There are some boards, bureaus, and commissions that might be abolished, some duplications that might be eliminated, without a scientific investigation—for instance, the Farm Board that has relieved the farmer of practically everything he had except his mortgages and deeds of trust. But everyone will agree that in a general program of reorganization, elimination, and consolidation a scientific study and survey should be made by a competent board composed of men broad enough and patriotic enough to rise above favoritism and political expediency, who will keep in view only the public good. In other words, in seeking to remedy the situation resulting from our impractical methods we should not hastily employ similar loose methods in attempting to effect a solution. A comprehensive reorganization and consolidation of the various agencies of the Federal Government, the elimination of duplicated and related functions which could be accomplished would ultimately result in a tremendous reduction of taxes. The President is talking a great deal about balancing the Budget, and in order to do so is very insistent upon increasing taxes. I feel that he should be just as earnest and insistent about balancing the Budget through economy and lowering the costs of government.

Never before has there been greater need nor a more insistent demand on the part of taxpayers of America for relief from profligate expenditures and high taxation. We are to-day in the midst of a panic—and I use the word "panic" advisedly—unprecedented in its extent and intensity. It has driven millions into the ranks of the unemployed, brought hunger and distress to thousands of once happy and prosperous homes, filled the poorhouses and asylums with the poverty stricken and insane, and marked its pathway with the crimson blood and dead bodies of suicides. Yet when the great corporations, international bankers, and bond brokers, responsible largely for the present plight of the small bankers, business men, and farmers, were about to become the victims of their own folly, they were promptly given relief to the extent of $2,000,000,000 at the expense of the already overburdened taxpayers of the Nation. The question of balancing the Budget evidently was forgotten. The so-called relief program for big business when put into full operation will obligate this Government to the extent of billions of dollars. Every step that has been taken has been primarily in the interest of big business, on the theory that some relief would trickle down to the common man. I can not subscribe to this Hamiltonian theory. In the midst of the present economic debacle the controlling thought seems to be to place the Government into every kind of private business at the expense of the public.

The Glenn-Smith bill, having in view the refinancing of drainage and levee districts, provides loans to public enterprises that are political subdivisions of States, and is an investment, not a dole. It would give relief to 5,000,000 people distributed in 34 States without the cost of one cent to the Government. Although it would be the means of saving the homes of hundreds of thousands of people from the auction block, apparently an attempt is being made to sidetrack it in order to give the President's program the right of way. This bill should be enacted without further delay. It is a relief measure of a constructive, permanent nature.

It is a thoroughly established fact that prosperity can not be purchased; that a nation can not convert a panic into prosperity by going into business with an empty treasury. Such a policy will finally lead to Government bankruptcy or an oppressive fiscal policy that will ultimately result in revolution. The power to tax is the power to destroy.

Credulous people who think that opening the Treasury of the United States and inviting the business interests to borrow at pleasure will produce prosperity remind one, as suggested recently by the Denver Post, of the old woman who called to her friends and said, "I'm so happy; I have just borrowed enough money to pay all my debts." No nation can borrow itself into prosperity. Neither can individuals nor corporations borrow themselves out of debt. The great trouble with the large institutions that have driven this Government to open its Treasury to them is that they are bonded and watered to death. They are like bloated steers and everybody seems to be afraid to puncture their inflated skins and let out the gas that is killing them.

Making it easy for corporations or individuals to borrow more millions at the expense of the taxpayers of the country only increases their inflation, likewise the burdens of the taxpayers, making all the worse the crash that will come sooner or later, and probably cause the collapse of our financial system. It is therefore imperative that we inaugurate a practical business policy in our fiscal affairs.

We are now faced with a deficit of more than $2,000,000,000, which is increasing day by day, and, I repeat, we are asked by the President to balance the Budget by increasing taxes. Every obnoxious tax known to legislative parlance has been recommended by the Hoover-Mellon-Mills coalition—stamp tax on drafts, checks, notes, deeds, and mortgages; tax on receipts of moving-picture shows, on automobiles and parts; a sales tax on almost everything; a tax on small incomes, and, to add insult to injury, they would make the tax retroactive in their desperate effort to balance the ever-increasing Budget.

To my mind the attitude of the people to-day is set forth very clearly in the following statement taken from a letter received from a prominent business man in my State:

> The most judicious plan to effect savings in the conducting of American business is recognized as being necessary to overcome present deplorable agricultural and business conditions. It should certainly be applied to the appropriations being made by Congress. When one sees and hears of the gross extravagance in the Government expenditures it not only fosters but greatly encourages socialistic ideas.

The Government has in the past decade made many questionable appropriations and pursued a policy of reckless and flagrant extravagance. Heads of departments and governmental agencies have demanded unbridled access to the public funds. These apalling and reckless expenditures, which account so materially for the present depression, suffering and distress, they would augment by greater appropriations and further expenditures. The people throughout the country are urged by the President and the spokesmen of his administration to practice economy and thrift. Farmers are criticized because, perchance, they have automobiles, and the laboring man is advised to walk. If economy is the road to success for the farmer and the laboring man, it should be a certain road to success for the big banker, the big corporation, and the Government as well.

In a recent discussion in the Senate Hon. CORDELL HULL, of Tennessee, one of the ablest Members of the Senate and one of the best informed students of government and fiscal affairs in the country, said in substance that "plans for the elimination of waste, extravagance, overlapping governmental agencies, and activities would effect enormous savings." Continuing, he said:

> Budgetary policy, so often ignored or abused, must be everywhere established and rigidly carried out so as to prevent any duplication or overlapping, or waste and extravagance, confining expenditures to absolutely necessary or thoroughly productive purposes.

Such a policy would be very refreshing to the American people, lighten their burdens, and restore confidence in their Government.

I warn you that the public mind is not in the proper frame to submit to any substantial increase in taxation unless we reduce the costs of government, eliminate waste and extravagance, and show a willingness and determination to keep our appropriations within reasonable limitations, confining them to essential and meritorious purposes.

The Seventy-second Congress is not responsible for the conditions that confront us at this time. I shall not undertake to place the responsibilities—the people of the country will do that. They are thinking to-day more than ever before. This Congress has a responsibility, however. We are solemnly obligated to watch appropriations, eliminate waste and extravagance, and balance the Budget largely by judicious saving in the administration of the Government rather than by greatly increased taxation. I would prefer to see the present administration take care of its deficit and relief legislation for the depression that it has brought upon us, by a bond issue, and not shirk its responsibility by forcing the issue over into the Democratic administration that is soon to follow.

Impatient with the leadership that has piloted us into this orgy of inexplicable extravagance and waste, the people of this country are aroused as never before. Inexorable and determined, they are demanding retrenchment, economy, and reform. A well-defined idea has again taken form in the public mind—not a new idea, but an old idea. The idea that fired the 300 at Thermopylæ and armed the 10,000 at Marathon; that drove Tarquin from Rome and aimed the arrow of Tell; the idea that charged with Cromwell and his Ironsides and accompanied Sidney to the block; that fired the farmer's gun at Lexington and razed the Bastile at Paris; the idea that inspired the charter in the cabin of the Mayflower and the Declaration of Independence in the Continental Congress. They are reasserting the principle that inspired the Boston Tea Party and rebelling against misrepresentation, high taxes, and extravagance in governmental affairs. They are demanding equal rights and equal opportunities for honor and fortune. Profound unrest is ever present when the burden of taxation becomes oppressive and when greed and avarice lifts its shaggy head in the affairs of men. The time has come when we must get back to fundamentals, back to the doctrine of the fathers, back to the principles of government promulgated by Thomas Jefferson, executed by Andrew Jackson, practiced by Abraham Lincoln, and glorified by Woodrow Wilson.

The pessimist thinks that the halycon days of this Republic are gone and pictures the future in darkness and gloom. But this is not true. Through the dark mantle of despair that hovers over us I see the sun. If I believed that the old golden glory of the days that are gone contained the sweetest and fullest cup of joy, it would stifle every aspiration of my soul and shatter every hope. There is a grander day for this great Republic. Happiness and prosperity will return, but that day will come and come only when the Government is divorced from the sordid influences of the high priests of pillage and plunder. The day of reckoning is at hand. An indignant people are rising in their might to drive the money changers from the temple "with scorpion whips tipped with consuming flames." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to make advances or loans to individuals, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural-credit corporations, livestock-loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks or to which such privileges may be extended.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I want to apologize to the committee for asking for this additional time, but I understand it is the purpose of the committee to discuss this bill fully and finish it to-day. It is a short bill, and I know that my additional time will in no way hinder or delay the ultimate vote on the bill.

Some very remarkable and keen constitutional arguments were made against this bill this morning, and they were made by Members who are always deliberate, always studious and scholarly, not impulsive, jumping up on the spur of the moment, as some of us do, but making arguments that are always well thought out and, according to their own admission, fundamentally sound. But may I, with all due deference, ask those distinguished constitutionalists now opposing this bill on constitutional grounds where they were with their sound constitutional arguments when we were discussing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill? [Applause.] This bill may be unconstitutional, but how about the finance reconstruction bill that these same gentlemen sponsored, supported, and voted for with gusto? Am I mistaken when I say that I think the great constitutional authority—and I say that respectfully—the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], took this floor and defended the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, or am I not mistaken? Oh, no. His remarks are to be found as a part of the permanent RECORD. All through the debate on that bill these same gentlemen were very active in favor of that measure. I believe at the time we were discussing that measure you will find the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], but yet they distinguish their argument that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provides for a loan to a corporation; hence constitutional and proper; but the bill now before the House provides for a loan to an individual; hence unconstitutional, improper, un-American, bolshevistic, and unsound.

I challenge any lawyer in this body, or elsewhere, to distinguish or to point out wherein under our law or any statute a corporation has any greater privileges or rights than the individual. In the very rules of construction of the United States code of laws it provides that persons and corporations are interchangeable, wherever used in the law. In fact, in over 15 statutes now on the books the two terms are interchangeable. We provide in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill for loans to whom? To banks, savings banks, trust companies, building and loan associations, insurance companies, mortgage-loan companies, farm-land banks, joint-stock land banks, Federal intermediate banks, railroads, and any other kind of a corporation providing it has lost sufficient millions to make it important. Where were the constitutional lawyers on that day? Or was it the case of the usual corporations saying to their lawyers, "Do not tell me what we can not do, but tell me how I can do it"?

What constitutional difference can there be if Federal aid is given to a group of persons avoiding personal responsibility under the cover of a corporation or to an individual personally responsible and liable?

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman arguing that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not constitutional?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am pointing out the inconsistency of our constitutional guides in the House.

Mr. McFADDEN. Does the gentleman think that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is unconstitutional? I will say that some Senators are saying that, and I was trying to get information.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I am pointing out the willingness of some Members of Congress to aid wealth and ignore human misery.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman, in his summary, did not include other finance institutions.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. If the gentleman will remember, we took out the mythical corporations. Indeed, as all now know, to take over the big fiasco of the Federal Credit Corporation, so much advertised and which turned out to be a dud.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. I understand there has been a loan of $2,000,000 under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law to a railroad for the purpose of paying interest, and I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks it would be constitutional under that act to loan money for the purpose of paying railroad dividends?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Why, $2,000,000 is a pittance; at this very moment deals are being made for loans of $100,000,000 each. What is the Constitution when large corporations are involved? Here we provide a limit of $10,000. Where is the gentleman from Arizona, my good friend, Mr. Douglas, who yesterday shed tears on the floor of this House in his plea to "balance the Budget" and for rigid economy? Where was he when we appropriated $500,000,000 outright to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and authorized an additional $1,500,000,000 in bonds, with Uncle Sam's indorsement and guarantee? Where were you gentlemen who are arguing for economy when we voted these large sums for the corporation without any assurance that it will put a single man to work? But to-day, when we pick out a stock raiser and contemplate loaning him $10,000, for which he has to put up his home and his land and his all, then we have constitutional objections raised and a plea made for rugged individualism. Where was your rugged individualism when we authorized originally a loan of $200,000,000, which we cut to $100,000,000, to any one borrower? And on what? On his home? Not at all. But on any kind of worthless security which he could not negotiate otherwise and upon which he could not obtain a loan. Deny that if you can!

Now, gentlemen, all of this talk about the Government not having the power to aid the individual can not be urged after the passage of the reconstruction finance bill and the inflation bill of only two days ago. Sooner or later we are going to be confronted with the necessity as to what we are going to do for direct relief. We can not dodge that. People are unemployed, people are starving. The vote in the other body yesterday is not the final say on that question. To date, the chief concern of the administration and Congress seems to be the stock ticker, rather than the actual needs of millions of our fellow citizens out of work, or broke on the farms. Is it wrong and is it unconstitutional to give aid to an individual? Is it wrong and unconstitutional to make loans to an individual and yet right to make loans to a corporation? Is that your constitutional line of demarkation? How can it be? For after all a corporation is only a group of individuals. It is only a legal entity. It enjoys no greater power, and its relation to the Federal Government is no different, than that of an individual. How could it be?

Why is it we succor railroads, aid tottering banks, make good the mistakes and sins of boards of directors by pouring into their depleted treasury many millions of dollars and take their questionable securities as collateral, on the ground that it is an emergency, and yet, if we plead for direct aid to the very men and women who have built up this country and who have created its wealth, we are immediately marked as radicals and the question of constitutionality is presented?

You can not get away from it, gentlemen. The localities are doing all they can. Private charity is doing all it can; but we have reached the point where the Federal Government will have to give direct relief in order to prevent loyal, fine, American citizens from starving to death—a sad commentary, indeed, on the progress of our civilization and the success of our economic system. [Applause.]

Why is it, in a sincere effort to restore confidence, when we suggested a plan that would guarantee deposits in banks through a national system that was brushed aside and ignored? Why grant aid to bankers and ignore depositors? Why is it, when we pleaded, in the interest of the dignity and security of American labor, for an immediate study of a plan of unemployment insurance, that was immediately classified as a most horrible thing, unconstitutional and un-American, a "dole"; and yet lavished and squandered $2,000,000,000, a subsidy on incompetent banking and a premium to the very people who dishonestly sold worthless bonds and unloaded fake securities on the public?

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Is the gentleman discussing this bill?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Very much so. I am discussing this bill very much.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman stated that a man who borrows under this bill must put up his home. However, as I read the bill, all he has to do is to make a statement as to his assets and liabilities, and his assets must be twice as much as the loan. The bill also provides that loans be made to individuals in order to set up a corporation which may get loans, and that is far different in the results possibly contemplated.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. This will require a statement to be made by the borrower. In that statement he must list his assets and his liabilities. The loan is made upon the representations contained in the statement, and if there is anything false in the statement the man goes to jail, but under the bill we passed a few days ago a man can present a lot of no-good securities and get a loan of $100,000,000, and then if it is found that the securities are not good there is no recourse as against any of the individuals of the corporation. [Applause.]

I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the provisions of the bill now under consideration are novel. I will agree with the gentleman that they are, indeed, far-fetched, but not at all comparable with the novelty and the far-reaching effect of the Reconstruction Finance bill which passed this House almost unanimously. This bill, at least, has the element of human kindness in it. The reconstruction finance bill is sordidly selfish and an aid to wealth.

Mr. GIFFORD. May I ask the gentleman a further question? Does not the gentleman think the bill might well be amended so that the individual of an industrial cooperative association may be allowed to purchase stock in his corporation, so that that corporation, after it is once large enough, may proceed to do business and to take over industrial things as well as agricultural things?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will say to my friend from Massachusetts not to become discouraged. This Congress will before very long be compelled to take action to bring relief in one way or another to the American working men and women. [Applause.]

Some of us have suffered in our efforts to endeavor to bring Congress to a full realization of the economic condition of the country. I say that it is the highest function of government to protect and take care of human life, and that in an economic depression such as we are in now, it is our first duty to take care of the human element and to take care of dividends afterwards.

Mr. GIFFORD. I would like to ask one more question. Does the gentleman favor any proposition wherein the Government will lend individuals money to form or to increase corporations and to take over and operate industry? Is not that sovietism 100 per cent?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If that is sovietism, it is the gentleman's example and not mine; but if it is sovietism, in the name of common sense and truthfulness, what is your Reconstruction Finance Corporation? Call it what you may, the effect is there. It is the creation of a superclass to be rewarded for failure and to be given more money of the people to further exploit the people.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 additional minutes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, for the present I shall not object; but I hope as many as can will get through within the limit of five minutes, because a number want to talk on the bill. I shall not object to this request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I want first of all to reply, if I may, to the arguments of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] and to the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that this bill is dangerous and revolutionary. It is alleged by these two gentlemen that this bill is without precedent. It is alleged, as a sweet morsel to their tongues, that it provides for loans to individuals to establish corporations.

Let us keep in mind that we are dealing with agricultural credit corporations, that the purpose of the legislation is to promote agriculture, and it does not deal with corporations generally. I submit that this legislation, instead of being dangerous and revolutionary, is more conservative than the legislation provided by the present Congress and by Congresses during the past 10 years in aid of Federal land banks and intermediate credit banks. Under the legislation providing for the establishment of these institutions, Mr. Chairman, the Federal Government subscribed the entire amount of the original capital stock. Under the pending legislation the Government provides for a maximum loan of only three-fourths of the capital stock.

This legislation is not without precedent. It was passed in this identical language one year ago, effective during the year 1931, and only in drought or similar areas. It was well considered, recommended then, and recommended now by the Department of Agriculture; and I submit if Congress had adopted the theory underlying this legislation in making provision for the establishment of Federal land banks, they would probably now be in better condition.

The individuals under the pending bill interested in agriculture are required to put up at least one-fourth of the capital stock. This is conservative. Instead of being revolutionary, I submit it is a wise provision, and I commend the Department of Agriculture for asking it to be inserted in this bill.

Complaint has been made that this matter was not considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency. Mr. Chairman, I am prepared to admit that that great committee has had much to do with the legislation at the present session of the Congress.

I commend it for its efforts, but I am by no means prepared to admit that that committee is the only committee of the House prepared to deal with questions relating particularly to agriculture. Legislation similar to this or identical with this was considered in the Seventy-first Congress, not once but twice, and each time all loans with respect to agriculture or all provisions for direct loans to farmers or for the organization of credit corporations were referred to, and properly considered by, the Committee on Agriculture.

The gentleman from Wisconsin is in error. The gentleman is unduly alarmed. In the discharge of his multitude of duties in keeping up with all legislation, he undoubtedly did not have an opportunity to refresh his memory upon the important bill passed just a year ago for relief, during 1931, in the drought areas.

I said that the language of this bill is identical with the language of the legislation passed last year for the establishment of agricultural credit corporations, and I shall read from the bill adopted and approved on February 14, 1931, and ask you to mark the language. In this connection, and before I read, I call attention, Mr. Chairman, to the history of this legislation and the necessity for it. It was a part of the legislation in aid of drought relief in 1931. The fundamental justification for direct loans to farmers was and is the total lack of local credit. It is the justification for the pending bill.

It will be remembered that Congress appropriated in December, 1930, $45,000,000 for drought relief in 1931, and shortly after that and on February 14, 1931, this appropriation was supplemented by an additional appropriation of $20,000,000, of which amount the Secretary of Agriculture allocated $10,000,000 for aid to credit corporations.

My information is that the Secretary only used about three million of the ten million allocated for aid to the credit corporations, and I understand the $7,000,000 unexpended, which, with $5,000,000 remaining of the $45,000,000, makes a total amount of about $12,000,000 balance unexpended. This legislation allocates not to exceed $10,000,000 of that amount as a revolving fund to promote credit corporations.

Now, the bill passed February 14, 1931, was for the purpose, and I quote from the bill—

> To make advances or loans to individuals in the drought and/or storm or hail stricken areas of the United States for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural credit corporations, livestock loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate-credit banks, or to which such privileges may be extended, and/or of making loans to individuals upon the security of the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations.

Now I read from the pending bill:

> The Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to make advances or loans to individuals under such regulations as he may prescribe for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural credit corporations, livestock loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate-credit banks or to which such privileges may be extended.

Not similar—but the legislation is in the exact language of the legislation of last year.

Now, the distinguished minority leader, Mr. SNELL, of New York, complains that the bill provides for a permanent revolving fund. It comes with the recommendation of the Department of Agriculture; and while I hold no brief for that department, I say to you that in my judgment this is a wise provision.

I have been a Member of this House for some years, and without exception every year we have made seed loans, and in my judgment the sooner we get away from that practice the better off we will be. I think the Secretary of Agriculture was wise when he recommended the legislation for aid to credit corporations to Congress a year ago. I think he is wise in recommending the enactment of the present legislation.

Again, I submit that while a revolving fund is created, it is better to provide a permanent fund, rather than have this legislation come before Congress at every session. If this is passed, it will largely eliminate direct loans to farmers.

Now, Mr. Chairman, something has been said about the provision of lending to individuals on 75 per cent of the amount of the stock. Personally, I know agriculture with respect to cotton growing, and I would prefer that the loans be made to banks and other corporations, as in the case of the Federal land banks and as in the case of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The Department of Agriculture takes a different view, and the Secretary has the experience of the past year to profit by.

What is the urgency, what is the necessity for these corporations in the agricultural areas of the United States? There are no sources of local credits in many places. The banks are closed. There are no individuals with money, because of the banking situation, who could subscribe in full to the capital stock. They have property, they have assets, and they are just as much entitled as individuals to consideration as are the great banks and the railroads and the great life-insurance companies of the United States; and when they put up one-fourth of the the value of the stock, with assets of at least double the amount, which the Government is expected to advance, it occurs to me that there is adequate security.

What about the details of the bill? They are nothing more nor less than the regulations, more stringent and conservative, adopted and used by the Secretary of Agriculture in making similar loans under the legislation passed in 1931. Moreover, they are intended to protect the fund. In the first place, the Secretary, by the limitations of this bill, would not be permitted to lend more than 75 per cent of the stock to the credit corporations, while under the law which we passed last year he had discretion to lend 100 per cent. The Federal Treasury is being protected; and instead of it being revolutionary and instead of it being dangerous, I repeat that the legislation is conservative. The handling of the fund is in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, and the establishment of agricultural credit corporations is just as essential as aid to banks, railroads, and life-insurance companies. The intermediate credit banks were established for the purpose of advancing production credit. There are no local agencies of credits, because the banks have failed. The purpose of this bill is to establish sound agricultural credit corporations, organized efficiently, with the power and authority to do business with the intermediate credit banks.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. ALLGOOD. Then the gentleman agrees that no one measure is going to cure all of our evils, that we do need more than the one remedy, more than one bill for the relief of agriculture, for the relief of banks, and for the relief of business?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I do. Inasmuch as Congress has already allocated in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation at least $50,000,000 for direct loans to farmers, and inasmuch as those loans are going to be small and widespread I submit that there will be a greater demand for this type of legislation than there was last year, or than there has ever been in the history of the country.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman will be interested in the testimony of Mr. Wall, bearing directly upon the assistance that these credit corporations are extending to the small banks that are having a great burden in many localities. He says:

> With the additional credit facilities it has been possible for country banks in those particular areas to strengthen their position inasmuch as the local credit corporations have taken over loans from banks which were in difficulty, and thus enabled those particular banks to build up their reserve and to continue operations.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. These credit corporations, in my judgment, will not only aid in the present emergency, but I believe they will in the end result in eliminating the direct loans to farmers from the Federal Treasury, and the advantage of this permanent revolving fund is to encourage and to perpetuate with that available fund the establishment of these corporations, so that it will not be necessary to pass legislation of this kind at every session of Congress.

While the authorization is not to exceed $10,000,000, the Secretary of Agriculture may not use all of that sum. Last year he was authorized to use $10,000,000 and he used only $2,000,000. The authorization is for $10,000,000, but Congress may not appropriate over $5,000,000. The point is that the bill provides for a permanent policy, conservative, and in my judgment, sound in the light of previous legislation with respect to agricultural production, and with respect to agricultural aid, and one that is greatly needed at this time.

The bill passed by Congress on February 14, 1931, provided for aid to agricultural credit corporations in the exact language contained in the pending bill, but it was only for the period of 1931 and limited to the drought and similar areas. The appropriation is not now available, inasmuch as it was limited to the year 1931. But conditions are even worse in the agricultural areas than they were in 1930 and 1931. Credits are difficult. Banks have closed. There are no sources of local credits. The direct loans to farmers are small. They will not be of benefit to the larger farmers, and particularly to the more extensive cotton growers. It is imperative that protection be extended to the cotton growers of the South and to the farmers of the Nation to whom the direct loans do not apply.

The Secretary will not lend more than $400 to any one farmer and not more than $1,600 to any one farmer in the direct loans. The intermediate credit banks will be assisted and helped by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Individual growers can not borrow from the intermediate credit banks. They can only deal with such banks through credit corporations or associations.

There are, however, but few of these corporations. Those interested, on account of the tremendous losses of the past two years, are unable to subscribe the capital stock.

The pending bill would enable the Government to subscribe not more than 75 per cent of the stock. There is no merit whatsoever in the argument or contention that the Government has never made loans to individuals. The individual is more important than the corporation. Loans have been made to associations and corporations in aid of banking and transportation. There is no reason under the law and under the Constitution why such loans should not be made to individuals. Personally I would prefer that the pending bill be amended, as individuals in the existing depression are without funds to enable loans to be made to banks and corporations, so that they could subscribe to the capital stock of credit associations. I appreciate, however, that the Department of Agriculture feels that the stockholders should furnish a part of the capital stock. They should have a pecuniary interest. The funds of the Government are safeguarded in the present bill, as loans are made to individuals and then only for not in excess of three-fourths of the capital stock, whereas in the case of Federal land banks, over which the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which my good friend, Mr. LUCE, is a member, has jurisdiction, the Government advanced the entire capital stock.

The apprehensions of the gentleman from Wisconsin are without foundation. The pending bill only aids agricultural credit corporations or associations. It is not intended to aid in the organization of corporations generally. The purpose is to promote production credit to agriculture.

I summarize by saying that under the terms of the bill loans will be available anywhere in the United States for assisting in forming agricultural credit corporations or in increasing the stock of such corporations. These loans will not be in excess of 75 per cent of the value of the stock. The matter is in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture. Loans will be made to individuals where liabilities are not in excess of one-half of the fair market value of their assets.

Again, the Secretary will carefully investigate the set-up, and if any corporation is unsound or impaired the loans may be called.

An important feature of the bill is that it provides, without any additional appropriation out of the unexpended appropriations heretofore made for drought relief in 1931, a revolving fund of not exceeding $10,000,000 to aid in the organization of agricultural credit corporations. It is my thought that this feature of the bill is especially constructive. It will enable farmers to help themselves. It will eliminate the necessity for passing emergency measures for loans to agriculture where the usual credit facilities have failed. I can not overemphasize the emergency that confronts the cotton growers of the South. Many do not know where they will obtain money with which to make their crops. The crop season is now on. Existing conditions demand the immediate passage of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "privileges" in line 10, and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am glad to support this bill, because I believe it is a step in the right direction and will help to make a more liberal and a better credit system for our farmers, and I think that everyone who knows the problems of the farmers of our country feels that is necessary, since a proper and cheaper credit is one of the farmers' needs. If we can do that, if this bill will accomplish that purpose, it will be a constructive measure. I hope the bill will pass and will not be so administered as to disappoint us.

I also want to say something to you about some of the conditions which have been brought to my attention through the public press which to me are alarming. I spoke on this same subject last Monday. I noticed yesterday that the Secretary of the Treasury submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means another tax suggestion. I repeat with all of the emphasis and power that I have that this country can not tax itself out of the depression. When we bring prosperity to this country, as we should, we will be able to raise taxes. I am astounded by the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury wherein he proposes to go into some of the fields heretofore only taxed by the States. I shall discuss for a moment his proposal to tax electricity. I think a great many of us from the different States feel that this commodity, when taxed as it is in my State, and other similar commodities should be reserved to the States and taxed at their source, rather than at the place of consumption, and passed on to the consumer. I believe, and I think everyone who has studied this question feels, that power and light is far too high and should be brought down. This is especially true of the domestic consumer, and I pledge myself to do everything I can to help bring the price of this commodity down within the reach of the farmer and small consumer as well as for those uses which benefit laborers. The domestic consumer will be taxed 7 per cent, I believe. It has been brought to your attention probably in studying these figures that some authorities estimate the domestic consumer of electricity in the United States only uses about 16⅔ per cent of the power generated, and they pay 66 per cent of the bill. The domestic consumer is supposed to use about one-sixth, although I am not absolutely certain of these statistics, and pays two-thirds of the bill. It is proposed to place a 7 per cent tax on this electricity that is going into the homes of the American people.

The proposal is also made to levy a tax on gas and other things. It is very interesting to me how they lighten up on the big incomes. They ask for a tax of 42 per cent on incomes of $500,000 and over, but it does not matter how much there is above that, the same identical per cent is levied. Some of our people have had incomes as high as around $20,000,000 or above. I say to you, and I am responsible to my constituents and to the country for what I say, that I believe we should revise our income tax, our estate and gift tax, and levy a substantial gift tax and return this country to prosperity, and then with these and a few other revisions will bring in the money with increased prosperity, or a return to prosperity.

Some of us who recognize the great monopoly of the Power Trust had hoped we might bring power down so that it could reach the home of the farmer and the poor people; but if we start a system like this, it will give them a further excuse to charge outrageous rates to the consumer.

Then, further, it is proposed to tax gasoline. In some of the States there is a gasoline tax as high as 7 cents a gallon. It is to be hoped the Federal Government will not enter this field and I hope and trust the members of the Committee on Ways and Means will see to it that they do not enter that field.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATTERSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Did the gentleman not recently read the statement of Mrs. Gann to the effect that the depression no longer existed?

Mr. PATTERSON. Oh, it has not existed for more than 30 or 60 days at a time, according to some prophecies, until recently.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The gentleman knows that prosperity is just around the corner.

Mr. PATTERSON. Prosperity has just been around the corner 30 or 60 days all the time, but after two years and four months it is, I regret to say, around the corner—I fear we do not know which corner.

Then I see further that the taxation of incomes is proposed to be brought down to the 1924 basis. It is to be extended to people who have a thousand-dollar income. I hope taxes are not levied as provided in accord with this suggestion. I believe it will do harm to the very thing we are trying to help. I repeat again that we can not tax ourselves out of the depression, and to lade new taxes and burdensome taxes on the farmer, laborer, and the small businessman, and others of a similar class will be unbearable and unjust in my opinion.

And I for one pledge myself to oppose a burdensome tax to the great masses of our people—the masses of the people in our country, including farmers, laborers, small business people, professional people, and others who are trying to own homes, and thousands who are trying to do legitimate business in our country. And we must take a stand here for the masses of our people, and I hope enough Members of this Congress will be found to protect them.

Mr. Chairman, I feel that this bill is a meritorious measure and one that should be passed to relieve the American farmer. That is one of the fundamental bases of prosperity in this country. In my judgment, there are two fundamental bases. One is the American farmer and the other is that class of people who work and earn a living by earning wages and salaries. Those are the fundamental bases of prosperity and there will be no prosperity in this country, and we can not regain prosperity with all the doles that are given to the railroads and other big interests, until we bring back the purchasing power of our people.

In closing I want to say that I, for one, expect from now on, until something more is done for relief to our people in this Congress, to oppose any measure brought in here which is not for relief to our people. I am in favor of this bill because it is a relief measure. The bills that are considered on the Private Calendar and the Consent Calendar, as well as others, as far as I am concerned, must be for some kind of relief, and that relief be deserved, or I shall oppose them. The time has come when this Congress should demand that the American people who are starving and distressed—the farmers, and the laborers, and the small business men, and our people in general—should be relieved. We can give relief and we should do it. For one I want to pledge myself to that program, that I will not support any legislation except that legislation that has some kind of relief, except, of course, the general appropriation bills. I was glad to support the legislation on Monday which had for its purpose giving the country more money in circulation, for I believe this was a relief measure, and I believe this bill is a relief measure, but we should go further yet and really give the masses of our people relief by bringing about employment and such prices to our farmers which will give them a reasonable and fair income which they do not have now. Our cotton farmers can not survive with the present prices which are far below cost of production, and we must change this condition. The wheat farmer, the corn farmer, the cattle and stock raiser, and others face the same condition, and we must remedy this condition. The laboring man is in a similar condition—we must relieve his condition—and I hope to see enough Members in this House pledge themselves to give this relief and prevent this extra tax burden on the masses of our people.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "extended" at the end of line 10 on the first page.

I rise, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of speaking in favor of this resolution. I do not propose at this time to enter into an extended discussion of whether this bill is constitutional or unconstitutional or whether the various measures that this House has passed during the present session are constitutional or unconstitutional.

This resolution appeals especially to me on two grounds. It is an effort upon the part of Congress to extend aid to that class of citizens of this country in whom I am very much interested, namely, the farmer. Secondly, it does not undertake to appropriate from the Federal Treasury any funds that have not already been allocated to farmers for the purpose. In other words, it does not undertake to appropriate new funds from the Treasury.

I think one of the admirable things in this country is the manner in which the farmers of the Nation who borrowed on loans for seed purposes last year, have responded to the call of the Government on those loans in these times of depression. Perhaps I will be pardoned for reference to my own home county, but there is one instance that is very strikingly commendable. In the county where I was born and reared, when the Farm Loan agent visited that county he found the farmers who had borrowed these seed loans ready to respond, and they paid the payments that were demanded and continued the extension of the balance of the loan without question.

I say it is a tribute to that class of citizens, in a time when there is absolutely no market for their products, that they are able, on their own credits, to borrow locally from their neighbors or elsewhere, or by thrift and economy arrange to meet this obligation.

We have heard much said here and criticisms passed from one side of this House to the other on the question of voting money for the benefit of corporations. I am one of the Members of this House who believe that the welfare of the country rests upon its whole citizenship without regard to classes, and I believe the welfare of one class will add to the prosperity of another. The farmers, as a class engaged in agriculture, are the ones to whom all other industries and all the people must look for their very existence. Therefore I say that this bill, which proposes to give to the farmers of the Nation and other individuals engaged in farming, if you please, though they be not farm owners, the right to obtain a loan through the Department of Agriculture for farming purposes, just brings the loan privilege down a little closer to the small farmer. When we limited in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill the borrowing capacity of corporations we did a wise thing, though we limited it to many millions of dollars.

Not long ago the Department of Agriculture issued a request to the cotton farmers to disregard, Mr. Chairman, the admonition that "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." They asked them to plow up every third row of their cotton. They forgot the statement in Holy Writ to the effect that "He that refuseth to plow by reason of the cold shall beg in harvest time and have nothing."

I believe in loaning to the farmers the same as to corporations and other industries, upon a statement showing double the value of the money to be borrowed. I believe in extending these loans to them and giving them an opportunity and a chance to continue their farming developments and their farm improvements throughout this land.

I stand here ready to vote for this upon the idea that it is constitutional under the general welfare clause of the Constitution, and is a loan to the industry that holds and owns 40 per cent of all the wealth of the Nation and is least responsible—in fact, not responsible at all—for the terrible depression in which we now are.

Another important reason for the enactment of this bill into law is the fact that it creates a kind of revolving fund and makes available for use money that is not now in use. It will aid in releasing from intermediate credit banks other moneys and give the tax and mortgage oppressed farmer further credit and thus relieve him and his family from having to answer for the sins of the speculators and plutocrats of America. I shall vote, Mr. Speaker, for the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I am another one of those who has been surprised at the opposition expressed to this legislation by Members who voted for the bill creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, who have voted for the bill to increase the capital stock of the Federal land banks by permitting the Government to subscribe thereto, and who have been for years voting for seed loans to individual farmers.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. THURSTON. Is it not also true that a few years ago Congress passed an act in behalf of the merchant marine providing that the Government could make loans to the extent of three-fourths of the cost of any ship that might be built, and that those securing the loans were only subjected to the rate of interest which the Government pays on its current borrowings, which would be about 3 per cent, rather than 5 or 6 per cent which the farmer would pay for this accommodation?

Mr. HOPE. I so understand, and no doubt many gentlemen who are opposing this legislation voted for that bill.

Now, what is the situation which this bill attempts to meet? Simply this: One of the greatest handicaps that the American farmer has had to contend with in recent years has been the lack of production credit. That is shown very clearly by the fact that in a majority of the years since 1919 this Congress has authorized loans to individual farmers for production credit. While those loans have been considered as temporary, we need not get the idea that we are going to get away from them until the time comes when we set up some system of production credit which will adequately serve the farming industry. That is what this bill attempts to do. Our intermediate credit act attempted to do that thing, but so far the farmers themselves have not been able to take advantage of it and to-day they are less in a position to do so than ever before, because they can not put up the initial capital which is required to set up the little local livestock and agricultural loan companies through which the act must function.

What does this bill do? It provides a part of that capital but not all of it, as in the case of the Federal land banks and in the case of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It provides that not exceeding 75 per cent shall be put up by the Government. The Department of Agriculture, which has sponsored this bill and which administered a similar bill which we passed last year, says that it will in many cases enable them to go out into communities which do not have adequate agricultural credit facilities at this time, and where the rates of interest are so high that the farmers can not pay them, and avoid making these seed loans, and will enable them to set up a permanent system of agricultural credits. That is the sole purpose of this bill. It is to help set up a system of agricultural credit that will take the Government out of the business of making little individual loans of $200, $300, and $400 every year to the farmers of this country. It will enable them to set up their own system of credits, so as to provide the kind of credit which agriculture needs and which is not available under our present financial set-up.

Let me say in conclusion that this bill was reported by the unanimous vote of the committee after hearings had been conducted for three days. There appeared before the committee the representatives of the Department of Agriculture, who explained how the loans which were made last year, under the legislation we passed then, had been administered, as well as representatives of agricultural organizations. All of them urged most strongly the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in order to propound a question to the chairman of the committee. I note from the report that it is stated, "It is expected these loans will be made at a low rate of interest." I have had a letter from the manager of a farmers' agricultural credit corporation, organized under the law which was passed in the last Congress, and he complains to me that the rate of interest charged him by the intermediate credit bank requires him to charge the farmer something like 9 per cent. So I would like to ask the chairman if it is his opinion that under the operation of this bill they could expect a better rate of interest for the farmers than the one to which I have referred?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman probably refers to an agricultural credit corporation rather than an intermediate credit bank?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The intermediate credit bank charges only 1 per cent above what it sells its debentures for, and just at the present time the debentures are somewhat high. The rate will vary. However, during the operation of the ones that have been organized under the last drought loan provision, the rate of interest has averaged between 6 and 7 per cent.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. If the gentleman will permit, in answering the question of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER], upon investigation, I believe the gentleman will find that in the 9 per cent there is included an addition which they make for the inspection of the lands and for their traveling expenses, whereas in this bill we get away from that.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. And we can fairly well expect that this bill will give them a better rate.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. JONES. It is hoped so. The agricultural credit corporations organized under the old system did not have the supervision which these organizations will have.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I am glad to have that information. My informant stated that the farmer was charged 9 per cent and the cost of inspection also.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I just want to take a minute of time to try to have the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] answer a question, because in his statement he said he did not understand why there is so much opposition to this bill. I think I can answer this. It seems to me that a bill of this importance is bound to arouse a certain amount of antagonism if it comes out on the floor with as little notice as this had. The bill came up this morning, and I did not know before I came on the floor that the bill was to be taken up. I have spoken to other gentlemen about me and I find they, too, did not know the bill was coming up. This bill deserves the attention of the House. It is not that I am opposed to legislation of this sort. I am in favor of helping the farmer, but, certainly, all bills of this kind ought to have more attention than it is possible to give this afternoon. It deserves attention and study.

Take the report, for instance. It does not say here one thing about the attitude of the Secretary of Agriculture. Now, where do we find out about that? In the hearings, of course; but the ordinary report that comes before the House on any bill is presumed, at least, to show something of the history of the legislation, including the attitude of the Secretary, to which it was referred, and matters of that sort, but not so with this bill.

We listened to the statements of the gentleman from Michigan, the gentleman from Texas, and others, and we got a glimmer of exactly what the bill means. I am trying to find out all I can about this bill, and when I do that I hope to be able to vote intelligently; but until I can find out something more about it, I do not intend to vote.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. I gladly yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I agree with the gentleman on the question that the House is entitled to more advance information on these various measures that we are asked to consider and vote upon, but I saw that this was a short resolution, and the gentleman will recall that I asked in the RECORD a question that indicated I was perfectly ignorant of what the bill was. I have tried to scan it and have read it two or three times and, on account of the nature of the resolution, I made up my mind to vote for it, anyhow.

Mr. ARENTZ. When the gentleman from Kentucky made his speech, he delivered it in such a way that I thought he knew all about it. He made a good speech. I say this without intending any discourtesy to the gentleman.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I wish to say to the gentleman that the committees have just one day of call during the session and this was our call day, and if we did not get the measure up to-day we could not get it up.

Mr. ARENTZ. What does the Secretary of Agriculture say about the bill?

Mr. JONES. The bill has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture; in fact, he went over the bill and suggested certain provisions—in fact, a number of its provisions—and he is very anxious to have it passed and has written a letter to the committee to that effect. A similar bill has just passed the Senate.

Mr. ARENTZ. What interest will these loans bear?

Mr. JONES. The interest under the present arrangement is 3 per cent, but that will be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. ARENTZ. What answer will be made to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER]?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Nebraska was referring to loans made to the individual farmers. I thought the gentleman was asking about the loans the Government is making.

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes; that is true.

Mr. JONES. It will be a low rate of interest.

Mr. ARENTZ. I hope the gentleman will put that information in the RECORD so that we may have it available.

Mr. FULBRIGHT rose.

Mr. ARENTZ. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. I want to say to the gentleman that I quite agree with him that we ought not to pass legislation without time for due consideration, but I would like to ask him if he thinks it is any more inappropriate to pass this bill than it was to pass the bill of the magnitude that we passed yesterday without any consideration whatever. I want to know if the gentleman thinks that legislation that is sent to us from the other end of the Avenue ought to be swallowed without any knowledge of it whatever.

Mr. ARENTZ. Two wrongs never made a right, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Nevada has no right to yield time under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, have I any time remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has one-half minute.

Mr. ARENTZ. In that one-half minute I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that I stated I yielded to my friend over here, which I did. I was not yielding any time but was simply allowing him to ask me a question. I am sure that on second thought the gentleman from Iowa will see that I have observed the rules of the House and did not yield of my time.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I want to get some information from the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Reserving the right to object, for the purpose of asking a question, I want to ask the gentleman from Texas if there is any objection to amending the bill so as to include merchants dealing in drugs or merchants dealing in hardware?

Mr. JONES. I do not think that would be germane.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It would not be subject to a point of order, if it is in the same line.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I want to know from the gentleman from Massachusetts if he would support such an amendment as he suggests providing for the relief that he so eloquently pleads for at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, there is a point or two in the resolution which I think ought to be emphasized, and which I do not think has been.

As I understand, this is simply a credit facility proposed to be offered to farmers for the establishment or organization of a credit finance corporation for agriculture.

There are a number of communities where farmers want to go into livestock business, but they have no money. They can not get funds through the intermediate credit banks, because they can not qualify for credit. In one of these localities with which I happen to be familiar the credit rules and regulations preclude them from getting the funds, for instance, because they require them to put up some 50 per cent of the money necessary to purchase the livestock, and in addition, to have on hand, in their barns or silos, sufficient food to feed the stock for a period of 12 months. That is an absolutely impossible condition and can not be complied with.

Under the provisions of this resolution, in communities of this character it will be possible to borrow, if the security and conditions warrant it, in the estimation of the Secretary of Agriculture; if 75 per cent of the money necessary to purchase the stock for the corporation can be borrowed from the Government and they can put up the 25 per cent necessary for complete organization, the farmers in communities such as I mention may be able to organize and operate business.

What happened when we established the Federal reserve bank? In that instance the Government organized the banks and sold them, as it were, to the stockholders.

Mr. LUCE. I do not think there was any such opportunity for individuals as that.

Mr. LARSEN. What is the difference? If you were a stockholder, you got the benefit of it; it so happens that they were all bankers and on the inside. The same thing was true as to the intermediate credit banks, and these banks are operated by men who are not farmers. You simply put the banker across the necks of the farmers.

Now, we want to put the farmer in position where he can organize for credit at the intermediate credit institutions. He ought to have this opportunity. If he goes to the local bank, he would have to pay 10 or 12 per cent interest and probably be unable to get the funds with which to organize If he gets it under this resolution, the rate should not exceed 5 or 6 per cent. One gentleman states the rate as 9 per cent at intermediate credit banks. That does not include the abstract fees, and in almost every section they are paying at least 10 per cent when you consider the abstract fees paid, but this money that we are going to get them to organize with in this instance will come from the Government at about 5 per cent.

Let us see if this is a good class of credit. In subsection (b) of the bill you will find that the Secretary of Agriculture has a right at any time when in his judgment the credit of the corporation is being impaired, or the management of the corporation is not satisfactory, to call for the amount due, and what does he get? He gets the stock that the Government has contributed to it and the 25 per cent that the individual has put into it. This should make it safe credit.

Mr. BURTNESS. And in addition to that the borrower is liable upon his note.

Mr. LARSEN. Of course; but I am telling you that he gets enough without additional liability. In addition to that, there must be the credit liability of the man who borrowed the money. There is nothing unusual about the character of credit in this instance except the fact that the terms given to the farmers are not the same liberal terms that we have been giving to other lines of endeavor not engaged in agriculture.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LARSEN. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. And is it not true that in the cases of rather scattered communities, where the rate of interest holds as high as the gentleman indicated, the rate of interest charged by other institutions would naturally have to be high because of the rather difficult credit conditions existing in the country.

Mr. LARSEN. That is true. The scarcity of money is so great that it is almost impossible to obtain funds with which to organize corporations for credit or of obtaining any advantages under the intermediate credit banks which we have heretofore organized. This resolution should put agriculture in a position where it can take advantage of the credit facilities created several years ago and which have been withheld on account of the conditions obtaining in the country and the adverse desire of the intermediate credit banks to extend credit.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, so far in this Congress I have occupied about two minutes in a speech, and I hope I shall not occupy much more time than that to-day. I would feel very small indeed if I put on a red shirt and stood here in this Chamber and proclaimed myself as being opposed to corporations as corporations. If I should be among those who criticize this bill, I would not criticize it because the benefit is to go to individuals. On the contrary, I would feel equally ashamed of myself if I were unable to point out a basic reason for objecting to the bill other than to say that what we have done or passed heretofore has been for corporations and that this is for individuals. There ought to be a basic distinction for any such criticism. I am glad that we have helped the corporations that we have helped. I talked the other day to a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and he pointed out to me how the great Reconstruction Finance Corporation is benefiting a certain railroad in my section of the State, thereby releasing money which was owed by the railroads to the banks of the community so that such banks can be paid and thereby making it possible for such banks to open up the jam and set business flowing. I am one of those who believe in the quantitative theory of money and currency, but I also believe that the basic thing for us to consider is the turnover of money and currency, and that when the turnover is quick and active, then business becomes good. As applying to this situation, if no reason can be given for objecting to this bill except that it is the first time that we have loaned money to individuals, then I can not go along with those gentleman who present that argument. It has been presented here by two gentlemen whom we regard, the dynamic character from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the erudite gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], to whom I am willing to accord my profound respect, although I disagree with them at this point.

Let me call your attention to a thing that has existed up to a day or two ago when we passed some legislation that helped the farmer. Heretofore a farmer could not go into the great Federal reserve system of banking in this country and borrow money for the purpose of paying interest upon his farm mortgage. Perhaps that is a wise provision. I do not think so. But I am not here to discuss it at this time. I called attention the other day that thousands of farmers are losing their homes. One-eighth of the farmers in the adjoining county to mine have been foreclosed and kicked out by the sheriff. The farmer could not go to the local bank and say that he wanted to borrow $300 to pay his interest on March 1, because the local banker was compelled to refuse and to say to the farmer, "I can not let you have that money, because your note will not be subject to rediscount within the Federal reserve system." But if the same farmer could approach the local bank and say that he wanted $300 to buy farm machinery, then his note would become subject to rediscount and the bank could furnish him the money.

It ought to make no difference what the loan is for, if it is a good loan and has behind it collateral and chattels which will back it up, and any such loan ought to be made to a farmer who needs it. The provisions of this bill will allow him to be provided with some money to meet the emergency in which he finds himself. Every one of the mortgages to which I have reference contains what is known as an acceleration clause. This acceleration clause is written into practically all of the mortgages executed in my State. It provides that if the farmer shall fail to pay his interest on March 1, provided that is the interest pay day—and in most of the cases that is true—then the whole loan falls due; and, therefore, with prices as they are now, the farmer is unable to get the money to pay the interest on his mortgage either from the local bank or by sale of farm products. The result is that the mortgage falls due at once. I say, therefore, that this bill is a thing that will give some relief to him, and it is in the nature of an emergency provision, and the farmer should have some way to protect his house and his home from foreclosure sale. And when you sell a man's home it is far different from stepping into the market tomorrow morning and selling the stocks and bonds which a debtor may have put up as collateral for a debt.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. MAY. There are about 2,500 places in this country, most of them in farming sections, where, when the farmer walks up to the bank and applies for a loan, he finds a notice on the door, "Closed by order of the board of directors."

Mr. GILCHRIST. That is very true; but I am talking about a condition which exists where the banks are open. In my section we have had no droughts, we have no grasshoppers, but the farmer has had a good crop but can not finance himself because of the ruinous prices which he must now accept for his products and his labor. Now, for the first time, here is legislation that will help him, and he should be helped.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa. I know that there are thousands of farmers who are being kicked out of their homes and evicted from their farms, as the gentleman says. Everybody knows—God Himself knows—that if anybody needs relief it is the farmer; but I want him to know and I want the rest of you to know that the need of the people, the small business man, and the small manufacturer in the city is just as great. There are more people who are being evicted from their homes in the cities than there are from the farms, and still we can never secure any relief legislation for those millions of unfortunate people who live in the cities, who are obliged to depend on dole and on charity. But not a single bill has been passed that would directly aid the 8,000,000 unemployed people in the cities, or the small banker, or the smaller manufacturer, or the small business man.

My genial friend the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] was wondering why there was so much haste with this legislation. I say to the gentleman that the Democratic Party is so desirous——

Mr. GILCHRIST. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I can not now. Later on I will. The Democratic Party is so desirous to help the farmers that, in the short space of this session, six or seven farm relief bills have been passed. If you Democrats think that by passing all of this farm legislation the farmers in Iowa or Kansas or the Dakotas will appreciate it, you are sadly mistaken. I say that, no matter what you do for the farmers in these States, when election time comes around they will foolishly vote for the Republican Party, depending on the promises, depending once more upon the false promises made by the Republican administration and the Republican Party. [Applause.] You Republicans may applaud; you may be able to fool them again, but I doubt very much whether you will fool very many of them. I think they are sick and tired of the prosperity which you have been giving them.

Now, permit me to make this observation. I am of the opinion that if we continue to appropriate millions and millions until the very last day of this session, we will not help the farmers. I believe an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure. We are not reaching the conditions that exist. We must begin to eliminate or eradicate the evil that is responsible for the condition in which the country, in which the farmer, and in which the people of the Nation find themselves. It is the terrific inflation and manipulation, permitted and sanctioned under a Republican President, that is responsible for this panic, for the destruction, and for the misery of people all over the United States.

During 1927, 1928, and 1929 the country was mulcted and milked dry. No wonder the people have no money.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I can not now.

No wonder the people have no money to pay a fair price for the things which the farmer produces. They have been robbed by the manipulators of Wall Street, and until we stop this manipulation we can not have any relief. Let us stop this infamous practice that has robbed 20,000,000 American people of their savings. Let us enact legislation that will make impossible in the future such a practice, such a destructive practice, that has been permitted by this great Government of ours.

I have been working for two and a half years to secure legislation to stop or, at least, curtail short selling on the stock exchanges. Had we adopted such a law two years ago, when I first called attention to this criminal activity, I assure you the distressing conditions which now prevail in this country would not have occurred. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, that short selling has materially aided in destruction of prices no honest man familiar with the practice can deny. Therefore, I say that in order to bring about stability in the market we must eliminate this "bear raiding" and short selling; and not until it has been eliminated will confidence be restored; and not until then will the farmer receive the just prices for his products that will make it unnecessary for him to depend upon the Federal Government for aid; yes, for existence. I am satisfied that as soon as short selling is prohibited we will have stability in the values of property and stocks, which will have an influence upon all commodities, and only then will the small number of the prudent men, who still have some funds left, begin to invest; but these men are entitled to know that when they do invest they will not be at the mercy of those few professional, price destroying, short selling "bear raiders."

All of the legislation that has been enacted thus far has been passed on the theory that it will reestablish confidence; therefore, I ask, in view of the fact that it will not cost the Government anything, why would it not be logical to enact legislation to stop short selling. I repeat, it is absolutely necessary and even more imperative than the millions and billions of dollars that we have appropriated in bringing about and reestablishing the much-needed confidence.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested in what the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] had to say in reference to not having sufficient time to study the bill before us or for its consideration. There was a hearing before the Committee on Foreign Affairs on what is known as the polar year bill, and I took the trouble to send a copy of the hearings to each and every Member of the House, believing it was very interesting and that he would see the importance of the bill. I am just wondering how many Members of the House took the trouble to read any part of that hearing and study the question. I sincerely hope they will do so before next week, when that bill will probably come before the House.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I want to say that I did and I am compelled to vote against it.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am sorry the gentleman looks at it in that manner.

Mr. Chairman, I represent a city district. We do not have any livestock in our district, but we have a great volume of watered stock, much of it overwatered. But that is not the question I wanted to speak about. We passed a bill which is supposed to appropriate $2,000,000,000 for loans to banks, railroad companies, and other corporations, in order to help reconstruct the country. We have passed a bill appropriating $125,000,000 to help the farm-loan banks, and I am glad to note that their stock has gone up since the Government made the loan. We are now engaged in passing a bill for $10,000,000 as a loan to help the farmers, who seem to be in a worse condition than many of the other people and corporations whom we have been trying to help. Now I am sad to state there is another body of people who have become bankrupt, who need loans and contributions, and it may be well for this committee to consider the question as to whether it should not amend this bill to help this other body of citizens and corporations.

This morning I received a letter from the Anti-Saloon League of America, in which it stated:

A sudden blow has struck, a new, unexpected, shocking blow. The Bank of Westerville has failed.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will not bring in collateral matters. To-day is Calendar Wednesday, and we want to finish this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope my colleague will let him read the letter.

Mr. LINTHICUM. You have been talking about collateral matters all day. It will not take me long to read this letter, and it adds humor to this very serious discussion.

A sudden blow has struck, a new, unexpected, shocking blow. The Bank of Westerville has failed.

Thus our local bank, a reliable resource of the national Anti-Saloon League for 20 years, is in the hands of the State superintendent of banks. It is now in process of liquidation.

Not much will be lost in deposits. But the league, after deeply cutting expenses, has required some very large loans. These are, of course, for short periods. They must be paid as they come due. We no longer deal with long-time friends. Several notes have been rediscounted to outside banks, which will also demand full payment at maturity.

Our league's credit is in peril. We turn for relief to you and to other faithful friends. Our league's obligations, incurred during the hard times, must be promptly met. What if this be not done? It would mean litigation and publicity with disastrous results. There's only one way. All must unite in sacrifice. We dare not fail.

In view of this emergency, won't you kindly send by first mail a special offering in addition to your regular gifts to the State or national league? Please send just as large a check as you can (payable either to the Anti-Saloon League of America or to Harry B. Sowers, treasurer) in the inclosed envelope. Do not put this off. Do not fail to send something. We know you will do your best.

Doctor McBride and Doctor Cherrington join me in this request; also the Ohio officers—see letter from Superintendent McNaught inclosed. We thank you for your aid at this crisis. Please reply by return mail.

Gratefully yours,

HOWARD H. RUSSELL.

Founder and First Superintendent Ohio Anti-Saloon League; Associate General Superintendent Anti-Saloon League of America.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, that is unfair, because there are only seven minutes left of the time that was fixed and limited for debate on this paragraph. That is unfair, because I must have time to answer the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say just in conclusion that I hope some provision will be made for these people. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 1, in line 4, strike out the words "to individuals, under such regulations as he may prescribe."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 4, after the word "loans," strike out the words "to individuals, under such regulations as he may prescribe."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I hold no brief for the Anti-Saloon League of America. But I can not permit it to be sneered at. It is an organization that is kept up by noble Christian men and women—Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Christians, Episcopalians, Catholics, and churchmen of every denomination in the land—to fight the infamous liquor traffic. The splendid gentleman who signed that letter of appeal——

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I am going to let the gentleman finish his statement, but after this I shall make the point of order that the remarks be confined to the bill, because there are some Members who really want to discuss this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. The splendid gentleman who signed that letter of appeal, Rev. Howard Hyde Russell, following the failure of the Westerville bank that contained all of his organization's funds, is the founder of this worthy and most valuable Anti-Saloon League of Ohio and its first superintendent. He has devoted much of his life to the cause of fighting the open saloon. He is associate general superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of America.

The reading of that letter by my friend from Maryland, the wet leader from Maryland, is worth thousands of dollars to the dry cause, because this appeal from Dr. Howard Hyde Russell will now go into every nook and corner of the United States when it appears in the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in the morning. It will let the people of the United States know that the bank at Westerville, Ohio, has failed and closed its doors; that it has taken all of the funds of the Anti-Saloon League that has been fighting the liquor traffic: and men and women everywhere, out of the goodness of their hearts, who believe in prohibition and who are against the open saloon, will contribute of their means, and it will have the effect that Doctor Russell intended. I hope my friend from Maryland will send them a check to-morrow for $1,000. I hope my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], who was making fun of the fact that he had received on of these letters—I want JOHN SCHAFER to send his check to them to-morrow for $1,000.

Mr. CELLER and Mr. SABATH rose.

Mr. BLANTON. To whom shall I yield first? The wet gentleman from New York or the wet gentleman from Chicago, both of whom, even though dripping wet, are splendid gentlemen.

Mr. CELLER. There will be no deposits lost. According to this letter they borrowed large sums of money which they will have to pay back, and they are asking funds for that purpose.

Mr. BLANTON. The people will respond nobly. Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and many other Christians, even from New York City, will help them out because there are many good men and women in New York City who are for the Constitution. They have not taken an oath to uphold it; they are not under oath "to uphold and defend the Constitution against all enemies, foreign and domestic," but they are for it nevertheless, and they will send in funds to Doctor Russell at Westerville, Ohio, I am sure.

The Anti-Saloon League is merely one of the numerous organizations fighting against the infamous liquor traffic. It is to the dry cause just what the gentleman from New York is to the wet cause. It is to the dry cause just what the gentleman from Maryland is to the wet cause. But it has many other exponents to help its cause, and when all of the organizations now fighting the open saloon unite their forces they are most powerful indeed. There are millions of men and women in the United States who are as dry as the desert of Sahara who have no connection whatever with the Anti-Saloon League. They are unalterably and uncompromisingly against the saloon and they are against the infamous liquor traffic which can make a great United States official, acting under orders from the Vare machine, turn overnight from a lifelong dry to a new wet. That is the power they are fighting, an infamous, pernicious, dangerous power that is a menace to good government everywhere in the United States.

These men and women everywhere of whom I speak, who with all their means and might and souls are fighting against the return of open saloons—and beer means just that—are fighting this moneyed octopus that stops at nothing; this liquor traffic which the committee of United States Senators, after careful investigation, reported "would debauch public officials and buy and control the press." You will remember that when this subsidized press misquoted the position of Bishop E. G. Richardson, the new president of the Anti-Saloon League of America, on the subject of a referendum, he, from his home at 1701 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., on January 20, 1932, gave to the press a written statement clearly announcing his position, and only the unsubsidized newspapers carried it. Here is what Bishop E. G. Richardson then said:

JANUARY 20, 1932.

Apparently from some reports that are reaching me an erroneous conclusion is being drawn from some of the statements that I made to the reporters recently in Washington. The few reports that I have seen are generally correct in their statements. I must believe, however, from some word that reaches me from various parts of the country that undue emphasis is being laid on some of the statements that I made, and others are being wrongly interpreted.

I was asked whether I believed in a referendum on the subject of prohibition. I replied in the negative and gave my reasons for my negative position. As has been reported where I have seen the reports of my interview. I stated that a referendum would be unconstitutional and meaningless.

I then went on to say that I conceded the right to every citizen to oppose the prohibition amendment if he conscientiously did not believe in it. Those citizens who do not believe in the prohibition amendment have just as much right to try to have it repealed or further amended as I have to try to keep it where it now is. I went on to state that the Constitution provides a way by which this can be attempted. These constitution processes provide a way for a constitutional referendum.

According to the Constitution, amendments may originate in the Congress or they may originate through the legislatures of the various States. If the opponents of the prohibition amendment can secure action through the legislatures of 36 States asking for the repeal or modification of the eighteenth amendment, they have an absolute right to do so.

In brief this was my statement to the press in Washington, and on this statement I am willing to stand.

E. G. RICHARDSON.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I want to know from the gentleman from Texas if these dry people included Mabel Walker Willebrandt.

Mr. BLANTON. With all due disappointment for what she has done since she went out of office, I want to say for that former splendid woman that, when she was Assistant United States Attorney General, watching these liquor violation cases before the Supreme Court of the United States, she rendered distinct and valuable service to this Nation. If through threats they can change a United States Senator overnight, from a dry to a wet, they can probably find positions and big salary inducements that would change a good woman from a dry to a wet also. [Laughter and applause.] It is the pernicious, dangerous power of the liquor traffic that does this, that makes it a menace to all civilization.

Mr. HART. The pernicious power of the money traffic.

Mr. BLANTON. Both of them, liquor and its unlimited money. They control powers here and there in legislatures, press offices, and congressess, and it is time that somebody was fighting them here, and I am going to do it uncompromisingly.

Mr. CELLER. When the gentleman looks at the vote taken in the Judiciary Committee yesterday on the Beck-Linthicum resolution——

Mr. BLANTON. Fourteen to nine.

Mr. CELLER (continuing). He will find that several dry States have fallen into the wet column.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, probably from wets purposely seeking places on that great committee. We must watch it to keep it from being stacked. I know it is unpolitic and dangerous for me politically to make this speech. Similar speeches have already aroused opposition to me. I know there will be "wet" money spent in my district to defeat me, but let them spend it. If it takes my office—and to be able to continue holding it keeps me from voicing my real sentiments—then let the office be damned. I would not want it at that price. I am going to speak my sentiments on the floor of this House as long as I am here, office or no office. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) No loans shall be made to individual stockholders on the capital stock of, or to create or increase the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization in an amount in excess of 75 per cent of the par value of the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization owned by or proposed to be subscribed to by such individual, nor unless such individual shall submit a credit statement (in such form as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe) which shall be verified by the investigation of the Secretary of Agriculture and shall show that such individual is not indebted in an amount in excess of one-half of the fair market value of his assets, and that the value of such assets above such indebtedness shall be at least twice the value of the loan applied for; nor shall any loan be made to any individual on the capital stock of, or to create or to increase the capital stock of, any corporation devoted mainly to the financing and/or sale of special products to farmers.

(b) No loan shall be made upon the capital stock of any corporation until the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the financial structure of such corporation is sound and unimpaired and by him approved, nor shall any loan be made upon the capital stock of such corporation until the management of such company shall be made known to and approved by the Secretary, and the Secretary shall have the right at any time to declare the indebtedness to the Government that may be created hereunder due whenever in his judgment the financial structure of the corporation shall become so impaired or the management become so unsatisfactory as to jeopardize the interests of the Government.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BOILEAU: Page 2, line 9, strike out all of lines 9, 10, and 11, and insert in lieu thereof the words "such individual's assets above his indebtedness is at."

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the members of the committee to lines 9, 10, and 11. The resolution provides that when an individual makes application for a loan he must file a credit statement, and then it says that such credit statement shall show such individual is not indebted in an amount in excess of one-half of the fair market value of his assets, and that the value of such assets above such indebtedness shall be at least twice the value of the loan applied for.

My amendment will take out the first qualification for this loan. It seems to me unfair that the resolution should provide that under no circumstances shall the individual's indebtedness exceed more than one-half of his total assets in order to qualify for a loan. In other words, under this resolution if a man has a $20,000 farm and he has a $10,000 mortgage on that farm, he could borrow $5,000, because there is a difference of $10,000 between his assets and his liabilities. He has a $10,000 equity in that farm and could borrow one-half of it, or $5,000, and increase his indebtedness up to $15,000; but if that same individual had just a few dollars more than $10,000 of indebtedness, or we will say if he had $11,000 of indebtedness on a $20,000 farm, with a clear equity of $9,000, he would be prohibited from borrowing one red cent.

I can not see the justice of this provision. It seems to me that the other provision, which requires that his net worth or the difference between his assets and liabilities shall be twice the amount applied for, is adequate security.

If a man has a $50,000 farm with a $26,000 encumbrance, he could not borrow a nickel, although he has a clear equity of $24,000; but a man with a $5,000 farm with a $2,500 mortgage on it, with a clear equity of only $2,500, could borrow $1,250.

In view of the fact that the resolution does not require that the individual mortgage or pledge his property, that this is grossly unfair, and I believe upon proper consideration the members of the committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Suppose a young man bought a piece of land under a contract which provides for the payment of $20,000 on the farm, on which he has paid $3,000, and we will say that all of his personal property is absolutely clear and amounts to the sum of $8,000, under this bill ne could not borrow a cent.

Mr. BOILEAU. Not a cent; but if another man had bought a $20,000 farm and paid $10,000 on the contract, leaving an equity of $10,000, he could borrow $5,000, or increase his liabilities to $15,000, and the Government would not be nearly as well secured as it would be in the case of the other man being loaned two or three thousand dollars.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I simply wish to state that this paragraph does not refer to individual loans which the borrowers may borrow or the livestock men may borrow from the Agricultural Credit Corporation. It is just an effort to throw some safeguard around the Government money that is lent for the purpose of enabling them to establish such a corporation.

Any farmer or any livestock man, after the corporation is established, may borrow such as his credit may entitle him to.

Mr. KETCHAM. This provision is giving him the qualifications for subscribing for stock.

Mr. JONES. Yes; he may subscribe for the stock if qualified under this provision. This is a safeguard which the Secretary of Agriculture, who assisted in preparing the measure, wanted put in for the protection of the Government in making loans for the stock itself. Ultimately a sound system is in the interest of the borrower.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Suppose you are qualified to come under the provisions of this bill, and purchase $2,500 worth of stock. Suppose I am not qualified to come in under the provisions of the bill, but suppose you sell your stock to me. Is there anything against that?

Mr. JONES. There is nothing against the sale of the stock. This is for loan, to enable a group of men to get together and organize a corporation. I suppose an individual might sell his stock, but if a majority of it fell into the hands of incompetent or irresponsible people the Government has a remedy in one of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BOILEAU. If I had $11,000 indebtedness and a $20,000 farm, is it not true that I would not be eligible to borrow anything from the corporation?

Mr. JONES. That would depend on what other assets you might have. Your assets must be double your liabilities before the Secretary would lend you money for the purchase of stock. But the credit corporation, after organization, would not be bound by this limitation. They would pass upon the loan by the corporation on its merits and on the value of the collateral offered.

Mr. BOILEAU. In the event that I had a $10,000 indebtedness and a $20,000 farm I could borrow $5,000, could I not?

Mr. JONES. Not necessarily. You might not be able to borrow any. It would depend on whether your credit statement satisfied the Secretary. The Secretary of Agriculture may make additional restrictions and would pass on the loan. I have no idea he would grant a $3,500 loan under the circumstances mentioned by you.

Mr. BOILEAU. Again, I ask the gentleman if it is not true that if I had the $20,000 farm and a $10,000 indebtedness I would be eligible to obtain a loan of $5,000?

Mr. JONES. No; not unless the corporation wanted to extend it.

Mr. BOILEAU. They would have the authority to give me the loan.

Mr. JONES. It is the corporation that makes the loan to individuals. This has no relation to individual borrowers, only for the purpose of buying stock in the corporation.

Mr. BOILEAU. The provision I object to is the one that requires him to have double the amount of assets over his liabilities.

Mr. JONES. I think that safeguard ought to be in the bill. What we want to do is get rid of an unsound system and establish a sound system. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The question was taken; and the amendment of Mr. BOILEAU was rejected.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I had not intended to take any time on this bill, but there seems to be considerable confusion among the Members as to what it is intended to do and as to the fundamental theory upon which the Federal Government is justified in adopting the proposal or not so justified. For this reason may I detain you briefly as to my viewpoint?

I think it advisable to call the attention of the membership of this committee to what took place when Congress enacted the so-called Lenroot-Anderson Act of some years ago, because we have to go back to that act as the foundation or background for this act. What was the intent of that act? It is to be found in its name, in a word. It is called the intermediate credit act. Why was it enacted? Because Congress and the country realized that there was no place in our existing financial system to which a farmer could go for the purpose of getting the intermediate credit needs he required from time to time taken care of. The Federal farm land bank system had been established for the long-term real-estate loans. It was thought and believed—and, of course, was true when banks were operating and functioning normally all over this country—that the short-term credit needs of farmer—his seasonal loans—would be taken care of by the local bankers; but there was no place where a farmer could obtain credit for a period of three or four years during the time, for instance, that a bunch of livestock that he desired to purchase would be grown and put in shape for sale so he could pay off the debt that he contracted in the purchase of that livestock. The same would apply to a case where he might desire to buy a herd of dairy cows.

We have now been operating under that act for several years, and what are the practical situations that have arisen since that time? In that act provision was made that the intermediate credit bank could make loans to, could discount livestock paper—and that is all they deal in—when guaranteed either by a local bank which would make livestock loans or through so-called agricultural credit corporations which were authorized to be established.

The one thing that has been most disappointing to me since the act was established is the fact that the provision with reference to the local banks discounting paper with the intermediate credit bank has not been found practicable, or at least we have had the experience that it is not used. Why has it not been used? I have asked dozens of bankers that question. They say that they can not deal in this type of agricultural paper and rediscount it with intermediate credit banks for the reason that when they do, their statement will show that they are owing money, and ordinarily the individual banker wants to get away from making that sort of a showing. Of course, that has been particularly true since the orgy of bank closings started throughout the agricultural sections a few years ago. They are afraid to borrow money when their statements will show bills payable and are in continued fear of a run on the bank.

That has limited the functioning of the intermediate credit banks to the so-called agricultural corporations. The theory of the law was that such corporations were to be organized generally by farmers themselves, and the farmers were first to put up the required capital stock, which capital stock would be additional security to the intermediate credit system, additional to the livestock paper that the individual credit corporation would discount with that system. When they started operations a few years ago they were liberal in requirements as to capital; it did not make much difference in what form the capital stock was kept. Leniency in that regard was soon found to be unwise and unsafe, and to-day the intermediate credit system requires every single individual agricultural credit corporation to deposit its entire capital stock in liquid securities with the intermediate credit banks, and those securities are held as collateral to all of the loans discounted by the local credit corporation. What is the situation now? Why the need of this law?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Dakota has expired.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I regret I must object to that.

Mr. BURTNESS. I modify my request to three minutes.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman submit to a unanimous-consent request before that is put?

Mr. BURTNESS. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I object.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in three minutes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LINTHICUM) there were—ayes 54, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTNESS. Mr. Chairman, to-day the farmers have no available funds, and there are no banks to which he can go, generally speaking, to get money to invest in the required stock to establish these agricultural credit corporations. That is the reason for this bill, and the sole reason for it. This measure will assist them to procure the necessary funds.

As was so well explained by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON] and a number of others here, the Government in making the loans proposed will get as security the stock itself for the amount that it will advance, which, in turn, is limited to 75 per cent. There has been some confusion on the theory that these loans now being considered are to be made direct to the farmers for various purposes. The loan is to be made for only one purpose, and that is to give those desiring to do so an opportunity to invest in the capital stock of the agricultural credit corporation, so that such corporation can function along the lines that Congress believed it would be able to function when we passed the original Lenroot-Anderson bill. This provision is not confined to farmers, but it applies to any person who is willing to invest in the capital stock of the agricultural credit corporation, which in turn will make loans to farmers on the security of livestock. That is the purpose of it. It is to assist it in that way.

The intermediate credit corporation will continue to accept applications for loans as in the past. When a new one is established, it will start to accept applications for loans from farmers. Every one of those loans must be adequately secured by farm chattels, principally livestock, if it is going to be rediscounted with the intermediate credit bank. They are generally loans on the finest kind of livestock—dairy or beef cattle—and they are made very conservatively, for they are generally limited at the present time to $25 or $30 per head. They are in actual practice limited to a value that is approximately one-third of what you would assume would be a fair value even in rather drastic times. So every one of those loans will be well secured. There is no question about that. The system as a whole has lost little or no money. This is simply an additional feature which experience shows to be a desirable set-up in order to make it function better. It is needed more to-day throughout the agricultural sections of the country than it has ever been needed in the past.

No ready capital is available for the required initial stock or to take care of needed enlargements of existing local credit corporations. Some now require the borrower to take out 5 or 10 per cent of their loan in stock, thus reducing the amount the farmer can obtain and which he generally sorely needs for operation. To him that appears as if he is paying 16 or 17 per cent interest on his loan. Of course, he remains the owner of the stock, but he does not always understand that. In any event, many of them can not afford to make the investment, and to-day he can not borrow on the capital stock itself, for no one stands ready to accept it as collateral.

We, who have had some experience with this matter, know the conservative business attitude of the management of the intermediate credit banks. Sometimes I have criticized them. I have urged them to be more liberal in the making of their loans. They have insisted at all times on a conservative policy; and probably, under our declining-price level on livestock, that policy has worked out to the best interests of agriculture in the long run, for otherwise the system might have become insolvent and thus been destroyed. In any event, there is little or no danger of losing any money by the enactment of this bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. No loan or advance shall be made to any individual upon the capital stock of or to create or increase the capital stock of any corporation, unless the capital stock of such corporation shall be at least $10,000.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KLEBERG: Page 3, line 6, after the word "the," insert the words "paid in."

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is agreeable to the committee and acceptable to them. The amendment is offered for the purpose of clarifying the language of this particular section of the bill.

Without referring further to the amendment, the reason for which is apparent, I would like to take occasion at this time to call the attention of the committee briefly to the reasons why this measure should be passed.

On numbers of occasions there have been before this House distinguished Members calling attention to conditions of all sorts confronting this country. Preeminently among those conditions there has been a very strong suggestion that the available capital or money or wealth, if you please, of this Nation on deposit and elsewhere is not now in circulation. This particular measure will put into immediate function and circulation $10,000,000 of the residue of a fund which at present is lying idle, the unused portion of the drought-relief fund.

In addition thereto it will enable the intermediate credit bank to put into circulation a large part of the fund they hold to the benefit of those engaged in agriculture, because of the fact that there is no chance at the present time for the farmer to avail himself, with present existing agencies in certain sections of the country, of the moneys in the hands of the intermediate credit banking system.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KLEBERG. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. How much is that fund that they did not use last year?

Mr. KLEBERG. There is a little over $11,000,000 remaining.

There are, then, two funds released and put into circulation. We have successfully combated a certain state of idleness of a large part of the capital which was voted and put into this depositary for the very purpose for which we ask the passage of this bill.

In addition, attention has been called to the vital necessity of balancing the Budget. I submit to you in all reasonableness that this bill does not endanger the balancing of the Budget. On the other hand, it enables the farmers, through production loans, to be able to pay their taxes in many instances which they could not pay because of inability to finance themselves for future production.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, I ask recognition in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I sometimes think of the peddler, who in Fleet Street Prison told Sam Weller that when money was left to him he found his overthrow came. Undoubtedly the farmers of the country are the class of people more than any other whom we have to encourage if good times are to return, but is it not better to encourage them not to borrow money but to pay off their loans and to adopt economical methods?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Many of them can not pay their taxes now. What is the use of asking them to pay off their loans?

Mr. STOKES. There is an old adage which says "Who goes a-borrowing goes a-sorrowing." Let us encourage them by trying to get them lower costs of transportation, lower costs of materials and supplies, and, if possible, higher prices for their produce.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That will stop them going a-borrowing.

Mr. STOKES. To be sure, this is only $10,000,000. That is not very much, but it adds something to our already heavily burdened Treasury. Ten million dollars, stretched out over this huge country, is nothing at all. It would be merely wasted. We should have ten times that much money. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is this same type of legislation. Let us give that a chance and see how it works out. That was aimed directly for agriculture, commerce, industry, the railroads. Let us give them a chance. The banks of the country are supposed to loan money to individuals.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Suppose there are not any banks in the country; suppose they have all gone broke?

Mr. STOKES. That point is well taken, but we have a corporation called the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with $2,000,000,000 assets, which is authorized to loan them money if they need it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. But I want to inform the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we can not get anything in the form of individual loans through that bill.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN. The gentleman was speaking about railroads. The gentleman is familiar with the fact that the first request for a loan under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was for a railroad, asking for $18,000,000, almost double the amount we are asking in this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, the main purpose was to rescue individual banks that were in distress. As far as the relief which will go to the railroads, it will be a fractional part, indeed. It was to relieve the banks in distress throughout the entire country.

Mr. ALLEN. But they reached out for the first grab at it. One of the Democratic principles—I wish it was one of the Republican principles and hope it soon will be—is that the States have the right to order and control their own domestic institutions according to their own judgment. Let us hold to that doctrine, because it has always been successful. [Applause.]

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. I have secured time for the purpose of asking one question of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield in order that I may make a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. UNDERHILL. For a number of years I have been voting for farm relief, farm relief this year, last year, the year before last, and running back quite a number of years. All I have succeeded in doing thus far is to put the farmer further into debt. That is one thing to which I object.

The second thing to which I object is the creation of Government bureaus in order to give easy jobs to hundreds of nonfarmers for which the farmer has to pay in taxes. In the third place, I object to the encouragement of a lobby here which is supported by voluntary membership fees from the pocket of the farmer, a lobby which exists for the assumed purpose of finding more ways to relieve the farmer, but principally for the purpose of perpetuating its own existence. Exploiting the poor farmer, the personnel lives the life of Riley here in Washington, and although ostensibly, as I said, exists for the purpose of finding more relief for the farmer, in reality it is enlarging a vicious circuit without a terminal of more taxes, more bureaus, and more jobs, all at the expense of the deluded farmer. Now, if this bill is going to stop that sort of thing, any or all of it, I would be willing to go along with the gentlemen, even if it goes further than we have ever gone before. One of the evil results of this continual agitation for supposed relief is the lobby to which I have referred, and one of the worst features of this lobby is that it sits on the neck of every man here who represents a farming constituency and tells him he must support its program or it will go into his district and defeat him for reelection.

There are many, many men in this body representing farming districts whom I admire, who are of the greatest value to the whole country, who take a broad, national view of questions. I do not blame them for feeling sometimes as though they are forced by circumstances and this tremendous farm lobby which has been built up here in Washington in recent years to vote for legislation which is not sound, which does not assist the farmer, but which, in fact, hurts the farmer, who has been sold the economic gold brick by farm organizations through misleading propaganda from Washington, D. C.

I have said all I intended to say on this question. But before this bill comes to a vote I would like the chairman of the committee to tell us how, where, and when we are going to stop this thing; when we are going to help the farmer out of this trouble and stop this effort to lift himself by his bootstraps or pushing him further and further into debt. I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I want to ask the chairman a question. The object of this bill, as it states, is to aid in the establishment of agricultural credit corporations. Who is going to form those corporations?

Mr. JONES. Usually individuals in the local communities, as they have been forming them under the drought relief act which is in the exact language of this bill.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Are these corporations to be formed by the general assemblies of the various States or the courts?

Mr. JONES. No. Provision has already been made in the intermediate credit act, with which the gentleman is familiar, for such corporations. Individuals who want to buy stock and form a corporation may get together in a community and borrow three-fourths of the necessary money and put up the remaining part.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I know that; but what court is to organize these corporations, and, if not any court, is the general assembly of a State to create a corporation? Somebody must create it.

Mr. JONES. The intermediate credit act provides for the filing of articles of incorporation with the board here in Washington; and they may, of course, organize under State laws.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I know they can, and that is the tribunal to which they should resort to be incorporated; but in this bill you undertake to permit them to create a corporation themselves.

Mr. JONES. No, no. Most States have general laws providing for incorporating a company, or stipulate the method that must be used. These laws, of course, must be complied with.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. You can not do it that way. A corporation must be created by the courts or a general assembly.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the language is susceptible to that construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may again be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. JONES. The amendment is acceptable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. To carry out the provisions of this resolution, including all expenses incurred thereunder, there are authorized to be appropriated, out of the unexpended balances of appropriations made to carry out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 112, Seventy-first Congress (46 Stat. 1032), as amended by the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and as amended by Public Resolution No. 120 (46 Stat. 1167), and out of the collections from loans made under Public Resolution No. 112, as so amended, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, which sum shall be paid into a revolving fund. Not to exceed 2 per cent of such fund may be used for expenses of administration. All moneys received from time to time upon the repayment of any advance or loan made pursuant to this act, together with the interest, shall be paid into the revolving fund and shall thereafter be available for the purposes and in the manner hereinbefore provided.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have debate closed except on amendments that are offered for a real purpose.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I have such an amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: On page 3, line 25, after the word "Provided," insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That the amount loaned in each State shall be allotted to the States in the proportion that their population bears to the total population of the United States, exclusive of the insular possessions, according to the United States census last preceding the end of the fiscal year in which such allotment is to be made."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment that it is not germane and brings in an entirely new method of distribution and arrangement and other similar action.

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. JONES. I think there are those that really want to discuss the bill. If the gentleman wants to discuss some features of the bill, I shall reserve it.

Mr. REED of New York. I would like to discuss the amendment for about a minute or two.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire of the gentleman from Texas what is his point of order?

Mr. JONES. That it is not germane and brings in entirely new matter and a system of allocation and allotment that is not provided in the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. And is inconsistent with the purposes of the bill, which is a farm measure and does not take in metropolitan New York with its 6,000,000 people.

Mr. REED of New York. They pay the taxes. I would like to have a minute or two on the amendment. Of course, I do not admit the force of the gentleman's point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas desire to press his point of order?

Mr. JONES. Yes. I reserve the point, however, so that the gentleman may discuss the matter.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, as I look about me here I am looking into the faces of a large group of men who have had an opportunity to see the interest I have always displayed in farm legislation. You men may not realize it, but in the great State of New York, with its large number of farms and its large farm population, the farmers there face difficulties just as well as do the farmers in Texas and the other States of the Union. We have our droughts and we have our grasshoppers, and we have all the difficulties that are visited by Providence upon the farmers of the country.

I have noticed as I have voted for large appropriations to assist farmers throughout the country, invariably there is a clause in the rules and regulations or in the law itself that before they can get any relief the Secretary of Agriculture must be satisfied that some extraordinary emergency must exist, and, as a rule, the farmers of New York State and of New England and of other sections where they pay large taxes to meet a crisis, seldom receive very much relief from such appropriations. When it is a matter of good roads or vocational education you will find us here favoring the legislation——

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. In just a moment. I only have a few minutes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. The gentleman can secure more time, because I think the gentleman is telling the God's truth. I think the gentleman is preaching a sermon, and I would like for him to continue. We help the banks and everything else, but when we come to help these poor devils we surround it in such a way that they can not receive any benefits.

Mr. REED of New York. I come from a farming district and they ask the question when I go home, "Why is it that you support these general farm propositions and yet we, as farmers, seldom receive relief from such measures?"

I know there is a great sense of fairness in the House here, and it strikes me it would only be fair to be sure that each State is going to get something for the relief of its farmers, and all I am proposing to do here is to see that a certain amount, based upon population, is allocated to New York and Pennsylvania and New England that pay a very large proportion of the taxes. If you were to do this, I am quite sure that these States would feel much more like going along on your good-roads program and your educational matters, as we invariably do, and I am simply submitting this amendment as a matter of common fairness to the men who need help when we are paying out these large sums of money.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I very gladly yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES. I would like to state to the gentleman that some of us tried to get an allocation on the same basis when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure was up, and they would not let us have it.

Mr. REED of New York. Do not blame me for that.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. ABERNETHY. North Carolina is the second largest tax-paying State in the Union, and we are getting darned little from any source.

Mr. REED of New York. And unless this amendment goes through you will not get a nickel for your farmers.

Mr. ABERNETHY. But I am not getting much under this administration, and that is what is worrying me.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes.

Mr. BURTNESS. Surely, the gentleman, by his amendment, does not intend to include the total population, but the farm population?

Mr. REED of New York. I would be very glad to.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does not the gentleman think he would get further with his amendment if he limited it to farm population?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, much has been said here this afternoon about how much is being done for the farmers. This bill authorizes the use of $10,000,000 as what we may term a revolving fund; $10,000,000, which is one-tenth of the amount that one corporation can borrow under the terms of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Now remember that this money will not be used for paying dividends, or for any similar purpose. It will be used to advance to individuals who can also put up at least 25 per cent, and then put up their stock as collateral security for the additional 75 per cent, and show that they are solvent, that they have assets over and above the liabilities which will equal twice the amount of money borrowed from the Secretary of Agriculture.

When the reconstruction bill was before another body, as shown on page 1698 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, a Member of that body sent up an amendment. I want you gentlemen to listen to the reading of this amendment. It is this:

> It shall be a condition to any loan made by the corporation as herein provided that the financial institution or corporation to which the loan is made shall not declare any dividend while such loan is outstanding, and it shall be expressly stated in each contract of loan that if any such dividend is declared, the loan shall immediately become due and payable, and the corporation shall proceed to enforce payment of the same; but the acceptance under section 5a of any draft or bill of exchange drawn upon the corporation shall not be considered a loan within the meaning of this prohibition.

Ordinarily, you would think that such a meritorious amendment would be adopted. It was not adopted; it was defeated, and the bill to-day provides that you can use this money for the purpose of paying dividends, which will result in paying dividends on watered stock and bonds in many instances. The big corporations will have their dividends paid from the United States Treasury.

Therefore, the amount of money provided in the legislation under consideration here now is very small and insignificant compared to the amount of money that can be loaned to one concern under the reconstruction finance bill, and for the purpose of paying dividends on its watered stock and bonds.

I would like to insert, Mr. Chairman, at this point a record of a number of bank failures. I ask unanimous consent to insert an editorial from an Alabama newspaper at this point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter is as follows:

MR. MELLON

Andrew Mellon is no longer Secretary of the Treasury. This news will be received with a sigh of relief by millions of American people. He has held this position, which is regarded as the head of our financial system, since 1921. During this 10 years there have been 6,447 bank failures, as compared with 762 during the preceding 10 years. During the term of CARTER GLASS, the last four years of the Wilson administration, there were only 161 bank failures. There were nearly three times as many bank failures in the United States in 1930 as during the entire eight years of the Wilson administration. Is it any wonder that there was rejoicing when Mellon resigned to become ambassador to England?—Oneonta Southern Democrat.

Mr. PATMAN. Now, that shows that there were 6,447 bank failures in the United States during the past 10 years. During the same period of time there was only one bank failure in Canada and no bank failure in England.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman permit this observation: Whereas only $10,000,000 is provided here under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act there may be expended six to ten times the amount, which would ultimately result in the use of $100,000,000.

Mr. PATMAN. But not guaranteed by the Government. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation will have its paper guaranteed by the Government. This will not be guaranteed by the Government. There is a considerable difference in that.

Mr. GLOVER. Now I call attention to the wording of the bill, beginning on line 20:

> All moneys received from time to time upon the repayment of any advance or loan made pursuant to this act, together with the interest, shall be paid into the revolving fund and shall thereafter be available for the purposes and in the manner hereinbefore provided.

In other words, if it is profitable, it would soon earn enough money so that the Government will get its money back, and they will have their own money.

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of this legislation, because it is a step in the right direction. The farmers of the country are in worse condition than ever before since the beginning of our Government. Banks are closing all over the country. Many counties in my section, which four or five years ago had two and three banks, to-day have no banks at all. That means that those farmers in those counties have no place where they can get the money they need for production purposes. This bill is along the line of furnishing money for production purposes. Unless some method is adopted to help the farmers of the country get a better price for commodities, in the future we will have to go still further than this bill goes. We passed a bill here a little while ago to purchase $125,000,000 of stock of the Federal land banks. Many people said that that would help the farmer and would stop the long-term farm-loan foreclosures throughout the country. On the day the bill was pending during last December I wired the Federal Land Bank of Columbia, S. C., and asked them how many loan foreclosures instituted by that bank were pending at that time. I wired that same bank last Saturday and asked them to tell me how many loan foreclosures were pending at that time, nearly two months later, and the two replies show that the foreclosures by this bank are increasing.

The farmers are losing their homes, and we must give them some real relief now if their homes are to be saved.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. McGUGIN. I am interested in what the gentleman is saying. How long a period of redemption do they have in Georgia, the Carolinas, and those other Southern States in which a farmer can hold his land and redeem it after the foreclosure of a mortgage?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. In Georgia most loans are made under a paper containing a power of attorney which gives the bank the right to advertise for a certain period, and then sell the property and perfect title on that day.

Mr. McGUGIN. Why is not the place to obtain relief for those farmers, who are being foreclosed back there, with their State legislatures instead of in Congress?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. State laws granting a long period of redemption would probably help in some cases. I am in favor of such a law, but even then, under the contract provisions of the Federal Constitution, I believe the equity of redemption would avail the farmer nothing.

Mr. ESLICK. Is it not a fact that these loans will not be made by the Federal land banks unless the equity of redemption is waived as a condition precedent?

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. I understand that is true in those States where an equity of redemption is provided by law. After all, the farmer eventually loses his farm when foreclosure takes place unless he can raise the money in some way.

In this emergency we must provide loans to the farmers until they can get on their feet again. After all, though, this is only temporary, and a plan should be presented helping the farmers get a better price for their products so they will become lenders rather than borrowers.

I am for this bill and shall vote for it. In the near future I purpose using enough time to again fully present my plan for real farm relief. For the present I want to make some observations on some kindred subjects, touching loans to farmers, the depression, and efforts to solve the present economic problems, and so forth. In this connection let me say, I am glad that on the 10th of this month the Secretary of Agriculture modified the rules and regulations as to production loans, so this money could be used to hire help or for any other production purpose. I regret very much the other rules were left without change. They are extremely vicious and very unfair.

Now let me again mention another vitally important matter. As I just said, the farm-loan foreclosure stampede has not abated in the least. When the bill to authorize the appropriation of $125,000,000 was being considered in the House the Columbia Farm Loan Bank had pending 834 foreclosures. On last Saturday the president of that bank, F. H. Daniel, and the general counsel, Harry D. Reed, wired me that there were then pending 881 foreclosures, or an increase of 47 foreclosures. The wire received from these officials confirmed my fears that this loan-foreclosure outrage would not at all abate as the result of this enormous additional appropriation for these banks. I am also sure no help along this line will come from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. Chairman, no man can ever explain a vote for these enormous appropriations and expenditures of the people's money for the big bankers and corporations and at the same time oppose all relief to the farmers and common people.

After these tremendous expenditures for the rich it is a breach of good faith with the farmer to increase his taxes and refuse to spend a comparatively small amount of money to stop the present heart-rending awful foreclosure procedures. Mr. Chairman, I can not find words to express the resentment that fills my very being when I contemplate just what has taken place.

I am simply heartbroken over the awful suffering of the people of our Nation and the apparently deliberate purpose of Congress to grant them no real substantial relief, but to add untold additional burdens to already broken and dying men and women.

This Congress convened during the high tide of the greatest suffering of the common people since the beginning of time. And pray behold its awful legislative record to date. The sum total until this bill to-day is a foreign-debt moratorium in behalf of international bankers, in furtherance of a scheme donating enough of the people's money to the big rich of this country and foreign nations to pay off every long-term loan of all our farmers; build each a new home; pay all their taxes for years to come; and set up a farm-relief plan making them happy and prosperous forever; and a so-called Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan enough of the people's money to big corporations—if used in behalf of the farmers—to stop all the farm-loan foreclosures, even in this depression, for the next 10 years; and also a bill furnishing $125,000,000 more money to Federal land banks in order that they may carry on with greater murderous design the present uncalled-for, unnecessary, and brutal foreclosure debauchery.

And now the Republican administration, the Democratic leaders in Congress, and the big newspapers are raising an awful din of self-serving praise about the recently launched measure giving more credit and power to the very crowd that already has control of all the credit, money, and incident political and financial power in the United States.

Oh, they say the New York Stock Market is going up. This does not mean prosperity for the common people. It ofttimes means the contrary. Millions and billions made on stock market in 1929 meant millions and billions of losses to the common people of our Nation. The gambler prospers over the downfall and because of the loss and destruction of others.

A great vulture of the air is prosperous as he eats and destroys the eggs and young of the smaller birds, but if the time should come when there are only vultures left in the bird kingdom his early gluttony would have become his own destruction. The gluttony of the great fish of the briny deep in eating countless millions of the smaller and younger fish is but a transitory prosperity of one at the expense of millions of others, a prosperity which if continued means ruin.

The greed of great corporate wealth is unjustly sapping millions from countless millions of men, women, and children—the very lifeblood of the Nation—and if not curbed will rob unto destruction and death the agricultural interest of the country, undermine and blast the very foundations of our Government, and destroy our Nation, and with it the greedy horde of American financial conspirators and traitors.

Let us not think that because bandits hold up a bank and get away with a hundred thousand dollars and are prosperous then that everyone else in the community is prosperous; neither let us believe that because the profiteers of the Nation are prosperous then that all the people of our Nation are prosperous. What is the real truth? During the latter part of 1929, less than three years ago, the United States Steel Corporation and other great corporations from their mass of stolen goods declared enormous stock dividends and otherwise published their tremendous earnings, and this was hailed with delight by many as a token of prosperity.

Away with this false idea of prosperity. On the contrary, it meant that a few individuals had gotten together a large accumulation of stolen property. It meant that heartless, soulless, conscienceless, big corporate interests, managed by men in many instances who are cold to every appeal of humanity, justice, and patriotism, were plundering, within unjust and basely discriminatory laws, more than a hundred million bleeding, suffering, and dying men, women, and children.

Such as this means that there are too many yet who rejoice over the unjust accumulation of wealth by one millionaire more than over the prosperity of the great common people. It means that the plundering of the Nation, or the common people, of hundreds of millions of dollars is to be hailed by many as an act of patriotism and that the perpetrator is to receive the plaudits of those engaged in similar business or well-wisher to it.

Such dividends in the midst of the human suffering and financial distress, which were even then abroad in our land, are not indicative of the prosperity of our Nation. They are a glaring signal of unjust and corrupt favortism in legislation and government. They are the result of the grossest sort of high-price fixing of what the common people must buy, and of a stubborn refusal to give the great citizenship of our Nation even a square deal.

For every chuckle of delight which dulls the conscience of the conspirators who hoard this and other similarly ill-gotten wealth there results the degradation, poverty, and death of countless millions of outraged men, women, and children.

And such as this is called prosperity. It is the prosperity of the lion destroying the lamb and of the eagle eating the sparrow. If this is prosperity, then the early settlers of our country were prosperous when the Indians were burning their homes, destroying their property, scalping their wives and children, and carrying them into captivity and to torture and death.

This is prosperity such as came to the Belgians when the German hordes were at their doors, when death and devastation were on every hand, and when the cannon roar rocked their hills.

This is success of a favored few wrung from the great common people by taskmasters more cruel than ever lashed Egyptian wretch or galley slave. It is the fiendish prosperity of those who put money ahead of men, property ahead of people, boodle ahead of boys and girls, criminal profits and pleasures ahead of children's rights and welfare, the profiteer ahead of the patriot, conscienceless greed ahead of our country's need, and gold ahead of God.

Away with the suggestion that Congress should voluntarily, or as servant of the corrupt and corrupting big interest, be guided by the money-mad clamor of the millionaires of the nation. Oh, that Congress, now and forever, would free itself from every influence save and except those actuated by an honest desire to serve the great masses of common people.

Heretofore the present Congress has attempted to save the profiteer, the stock gambler, and the millionaire and the great corporations with apparently an utter disregard of the rights of the farmers and the common folks. With the present bill comes the first hope of real relief.

I repeat, this is the record of the present Congress to date. The future is filled with promises of much more of the same kind of legislation, while very little is either done or promised worthy of the name of real legislation for the farmers or common people.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, unless there is a revolution of the legislative program of those in charge of affairs in Congress, the people may as well now learn that little or nothing is to be done in their behalf by this Congress and that they must struggle on without hope, praying that yet in some way, sometime, justice may be done in behalf of the farmer and the masses of America.

Every move of any consequence so far is to take millions and even billions out of the pockets of the common people and put it into the vaults of the money-mad bankers of Wall Street. Some are determined to save the millionaires even if all other people are destroyed by the process.

Many of us here are determined to fight to the last ditch, even if there is little hope of success. We can not afford to stop and fold our arms amidst such suffering. We must struggle on with our comrades and suffer, hoping all the while to save our great citizenry of common people, and, saving them, save our country.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say I now indulge the fond hope that we are at the turning of the tide and that this bill is not only a step in the right direction but that in the future the Congress will work out its own program rather than follow the suggestions of others. I have unbounded faith in the ability, honesty of purpose, and patriotism of the leaders in charge of the legislative program of the House at this time, and feel that if any mistakes have been made they have been made in our leaders being led, rather than in their leading.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I come from an agricultural State. I am perfectly willing to concede in the beginning that this bill is socialistic in its nature. As I have said before on the floor of this House, I do not believe the obligation is upon the Congress of the United States to solve the financial, social, and economic problems of the individual citizens of this country. The Federal Government was not framed for that purpose. The United States Government does not operate under that kind of a constitution. The point brought up by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] is illustrative of how helpless we are in sitting here in the Congress and trying to take care of the debtor farmers of this country. I refer to his suggestion that farm mortgages are being foreclosed in wholesale. I realize that the foreclosures of mortgages at this time are wiping farmers out all over this country, selling their homes out from under them at a distressed market, but that is not the problem of Congress; it is the problem of your own State legislatures. Congress has no power to meet this situation.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Not at this time. The State legislature alone can and should enact laws providing for a decent period of redemption, so that money lenders can not sell property at depressed prices. We have a law in Kansas providing 18 months in which a landowner may redeem after foreclosure of a mortgage. Every day I receive letters from farmers throughout the country whose homes are being foreclosed, but I have not received any letters of that kind from Kansas, because the State laws there protect the landowner. Congress can not give them that protection.

Coming to this bill, socialistic though it is, it is no more socialistic than the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. The thing which causes me to look upon the present situation with despair is that we are following the precepts of socialism in trying to solve our problems. We are constantly hearing the cry for Congress to help this one or that one. Let me make this observation. If we can get out of this difficulty following the precepts of socialism, then be not surprised if socialism overwhelms our country.

If socialism is the kind of a government which can pull us out of an emergency, then it is the right kind of a government in fair weather. I am not ready to make the concession that socialism is the right kind of a government in prosperity or in depression. We can not escape the proposition that every time we appropriate money out of the Public Treasury to solve our troubles, whether they be troubles of the plug hats or of the humble people, we are following socialism. Marxism is sweeping this country, and nowhere is it finding greater hold than in this particular Congress by the very emergency programs we have been carrying out so far during this session.

Save and except the bill which will put more money into circulation, I know not of a single emergency measure that is not founded upon the proposition of milking the public Treasury. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] about this bill being socialistic in its nature, but let me say to the gentleman, the gentleman supported the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. That bill provided eighteen hundred million dollars to finance the industrial and financial world. This bill provides for $10,000,000 to try to finance agriculture. Agriculture receives, therefore, one-half of 1 per cent as much as was received by industry, although agriculture represents 40 per cent of the business of the Nation.

Let us see how ridiculous we are getting in this situation. When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was being considered, in order to justify the vote of rural Congressmen there was set aside two hundred million for agriculture. That was to be used exclusively for seeds. To-day $10,000,000 is asked for agricultural credit. Ten million dollars to finance agriculture and $200,000,000 for seed loans! That is some of the wisdom and intelligence of the socialism practiced in this Congress. This bill to-day of $10,000,000 to finance agriculture means about 60 cents in credit per capita for the 27,000,000 farm people. It means about $2.50 worth of credit for every American farmer, yet there are those who oppose it, while at the same time they cheerfully voted eighteen hundred million dollars exclusively for industry and finance.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON] the balance of the time.

RELIEF LEGISLATION FOR WAR VETERANS AND DEPENDENTS

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members, I have asked the indulgence of the committee at this time to speak out of order for the purpose of calling attention to a few of the many bills now pending in Congress or before the respective committees for the relief of our war veterans, their widows, orphans, and aged dependent parents, as well as other measures in which the American Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, and other service men's organizations are vitally interested.

ACTION TOO LONG DELAYED

Congress has been in session since the early part of last December, and up to this good hour not one measure has been passed that is sponsored by the American Legion nor one in which that great body of men, who fought and won the World War, is especially interested. Judging from the letters I am receiving from former service men, I feel that many are becoming restless and are wondering if Congress might adjourn without passing all or any part of their program. Speaking for one—and for one only—I, too, have become concerned for fear this Congress is going to be too busy taking care of the needs of international bankers and other big business in America, China, and elsewhere to heed the demands of the millions of America's war veterans and their dependent families, many of whom are in deep distress.

WIDOWS' PENSION BILLS

Let me recount some of the pending legislation to which I especially refer. A widows' pension measure, known as the Rankin bill—H. R. 8080—recently reported out of the World War Veterans' Committee and soon to be considered by the House, proposes to pay a small allowance or pension to widows of World War veterans—$20 per month, with $6 extra for each additional child. This bill is similar, if not almost identical, to a measure introduced by me in the early part of the present session, except that the childless widow, included in my bill, would receive no benefits from the Rankin measure—an unjust discrimination. However, it is better than nothing, and would bring relief to thousands of needy widows of war veterans. The Rankin measure also proposes to pay dependent parents of deceased World War veterans $15 each per month, or $20 if only one parent is living, provided that such parent is not only dependent but has reached the age of 65 years. The importance of the passage of this or similar legislation can not be overemphasized. Another pension measure for widows—H. R. 7230—is, in my judgment, a much more desirable measure. It proposes that widows of all war veterans be treated alike. That is to say, it would pay all such widows under the age of 40 years $20 per month, with an increase to $30 at 40 years; $40 at the age of 50, and $50 per month when the widow reaches the age of 70 years. For each child under 16 years the widow would also receive an additional $6 per month. The Gasque measure has been reported out of the committee favorably and has, as I understand, the indorsement of all veterans' organizations.

WOULD AMEND INSURANCE LAWS

The cumbersome insurance laws should be amended in several respects. H. R. 6406 proposes to extend the time for a period of five years for a veteran or his beneficiary to sue on Government insurance, and another would make brothers and sisters become beneficiaries under the law. This legislation is urgently needed. At the present time there are hundreds of cases that are admitted to be deserving but which are barred on account of the limitation of present law.

H. R. 7374 provides for the renewal of 5-year term Government insurance without increasing premium rate and without medical examination. Unless this or a similar measure is passed during the present session of Congress, thousands of our war veterans, who have sacrificed and stinted themselves to pay their insurance premiums for the past 14 or 15 years, will be forced to let their insurance policies drop at a time and age when they and their families need protection more than at any time in their lives.

OUR DISABLED VETERANS

A large number of measures for the relief of our unfortunate disabled veterans are pending before the committees at this time, some of which are of vital importance. Time, of course, does not permit me to discuss all of them. For example, there are thousands of deserving veterans who are permanently disabled, but who have been unable to prove, to the satisfaction of the Veterans' Administration, that their disabilities are in fact service connected, and, therefore, get no consideration under the present law. Unless such a veteran can prove that his disability is 25 per cent or more, and that such disability is permanent, he can not establish his claim. Just what 25 per cent is, or by what method the alleged doctors of the bureau reach their decision that a case is permanent, is a mystery that we laymen do not pretend to understand. I have in mind a number of deserving cases wherein the veteran has been unable physically to do any manual labor for several years, and who had clear and specific statements from their local physicians as to the physical condition of the veteran, but whose claims have been denied time and again, either on the ground that disability was less than 25 per cent, or else the condition was not permanent. H. R. 8979 would give a measure of relief in such cases, inasmuch as it proposes to lower the minimum percentage of disability from 25 to 15 per cent.

The World War veterans' act originally passed in 1924 does not meet the demands of to-day. There are a number of bills pending for the purpose of eliminating red tape and clarifying present laws. Inasmuch as I now have more than 2,500 claims before the Veterans' Administration, I am reminded almost daily of the urgent need for additional legislation to meet the present situation for the relief of our disabled veterans and their dependents.

TOO MUCH COST SAY OPPOSITION

Some two years ago when I addressed the House at length on the subject of my remarks to-day, the same objection was raised then to this legislation as we now hear. At that time, despite the fact that Congress had recently made a drastic reduction on income taxes, especially in the higher brackets, a great wail went up from some of our then leaders in Congress that we were spending too much money for our World War veterans. In my remarks made two years ago on this subject I said in part:

> Some one has raised the point that if this bill is passed, Congress will be compelled to repeal the law refunding $190,000,000 income taxes. This, to my mind, is abundant reason for this legislation. Why not let those millionaires who profiteered to the tune of 500 to 700 per cent during the World War, while our soldier boys worked for $1 a day, help pay cost of this legislation for these disabled and helpless veterans?
> [Applause.]

In the same remarks, in discussing the need for legislation for the disabled and the inconsistency of some in opposing same, I further said:

> Last December this House voted to relieve France of $407,000,000 of indebtedness to the United States. Some of you who are now opposing this bill stood on the floor of the House and pleaded eloquently for "poor poverty-stricken France." You were anxious to relieve France of the debt of $407,000,000 which she owed the American people, in order to show your "brotherly love," but to the thousands of our own American soldiers who lost their health in France and who are to-day looking to this Congress for their very existence, you turn a deaf ear, put your hands on your pocketbooks, with the flimsy excuse that it will cost too much money. [Applause.]

MUST CANCEL INTERSET

H. R. 4586, proposing to cancel the 4½ per cent compound interest now being charged war veterans by the Government for loans made them on their "bonus" certificates from their own funds, is still another measure in which our veterans and their dependents are especially interested. Once again we hear the cry that it will cost too much. This bill also provides that loans may be made to veterans by the Government immediately after issuance of their adjusted-service certificates, instead of being required to wait a period of two years, a very unnecessary and absurd provision of the present law. It is working a hardship upon many of our worthy veterans who are in financial distress and in urgent need of obtaining loans upon their certificates. Early passage of this or a similar bill is imperative.

Permit me to say again, as I have previously stated upon this floor, that I favor payment of the so-called "bonus" certificates in cash. This is a debt due the veterans by the Government. It is not only a just debt but an acknowledged obligation on the part of the Government to the veterans and should be paid now. I have had considerable to say in the past in criticism of war profiteers and shall discuss that again in a moment. First, however, we ought to at least partially pay those men who actually fought the last one. Let us in this manner take some of the profits out of the last war. [Applause.] Let us say to our Nation's defenders that their services were as necessary and as much appreciated as were the services of the railroads, shipbuilders, and civilian workers. But we are told that this is not a part of the American Legion program because of the failure on the part of the last national convention of the American Legion to go on record favoring the full cash settlement of adjusted-service certificates. I do not care to go into a discussion as to the reason for lack of affirmative action on the part of our national convention. Nor do I know how the legionaires and other ex-service men of the rest of the country feel. I will say, however, that practically every post in the district I have the honor to represent has officially gone on record favoring full cash payment now. Many other patriotic as well as civic organizations in Oklahoma, as well as other States, have done likewise. Nevertheless, the Patman bill, the Hastings measure, as well as dozens of similar bills, proposing to pay the last half of the bonus certificates are still sleeping peacefully in the committee.

WAR, PEACE, AND PREPAREDNESS

Now, I desire to say a word about war, peace, and preparedness. Our war veterans and veterans' organizations, like the American Legion and auxiliary, are repeatedly charged by their enemies with being militarists. That charge is unfair and unfounded. Men who have faced machine guns, who have suffered the privations and hardships of war, who have stood in the muddy, filthy, cootie-infested trenches of Flanders Field, Chateau-Thierry, and the Argonne Forest do not desire another war. They abhor the thought of another armed conflict. The sad memories of the last one to thousands are not only a terrible nightmare, but a grim reality. They think of war as heartless military murder. They know, too, that war is utterly useless and seldom settles anything. Mothers, wives, and sisters of our war veterans are more bitter against war. Millions of innocent and helpless children cry out against war. Our veterans and veterans' organizations, however, if I know their sentiments generally, feel that one of the surest ways of maintaining peace in America is for us to be reasonably well prepared against war. It is folly to say that for the United States to disarm or materially reduce our Army, Navy, and aircraft, while all Europe arms to the belt, would be any insurance against future wars. To disarm under such conditions would be national suicide.

MUST MAKE WAR PROFITEERING IMPOSSIBLE

For several weeks the black clouds of war have been hanging low over the Far East; the jingoists, professional militarists and war profiteers, are already beginning to demand war against a powerful Government on the other side of the globe. It is high time for Congress to make it plain that before this Government shall ever call on the young men of this Nation to serve in armed forces against a foreign foe, that all wealth and materials necessary to conduct a war without profit to anyone shall be placed under military rule. I submit that the resources and wealth of this land are not as dear as the most humble human life. Some of us have been advocating such a law for many years and are convinced that if Congress will take a firm and definite action on this part of the American Legion program, which, by the way, has also the indorsement of every farm organization in America, it will mean infinitely more to the safety and security of our people than great armies, modern machine guns, death-dealing gases, huge cannon balls, or thirty to forty million dollar battleships.

PEACE CONFERENCES FAIL

If this Congress could be induced to adopt a program that would make future war profits impossible, I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it would be a mighty forward step in the great cause for world-wide peace. It would be more practical and much less expensive than to send a delegation from America to a so-called peace conference in Europe, who will spend some three or four hundred thousand dollars in wining and dining bewhiskered foreigners, none of whom are our friends, but many of whom are eager to get the United States embroiled in the ever-present and the constantly increasing troubles of the Old World. I expressed this same thought some four years ago, in addressing the House, when, as I recall, another alleged peace conference was scheduled to be held in Geneva, Switzerland. At that time I closed my remarks as follows:

If peace is to be maintained in this great land of ours, we must take the profits out of war. We must eliminate the blighting effects of the damnable profiteers who have amassed great fortunes out of war. We must make it plain to our people and the world that property is no more sacred to America than human lives. We must conscript every available resource in this country in case of armed conflict. That will do far more, Mr. Speaker, toward perpetuating the peace of the world than all the peace conferences held in the past decade. Let us eliminate the profits of war, and then, when the other nations follow our example, peace will breathe as fragrantly in the world almost as if the day of redemption had come.

Having myself attended two peace conferences in Europe as one of the representatives of this body since becoming a Member of Congress, I desire to state that I share the same views to-day as I did when I addressed the House on this subject in 1928.

CONGRESS PASSED BUCK TO COMMISSION

It occurs to me that Congress has thus far not taken this important proposed legislation very seriously. As a sort of "sop" to the American Legion and other organizations that for the past 10 or 12 years have been urging the passage of the universal draft law, the last Congress made a faint and feeble gesture. Inasmuch as commissions were being appointed almost daily during the last Congress in order to "pass the buck" and evade embarrassing issues, some one conceived the idea of getting rid of this agitation for elimination of war profits by appointing one more commission. Just what it was supposed to do has never been made quite clear.

No one could be sure by reading the verbiage of the resolution creating that commission, but judging from some of the millionaires who were named on it, possibly the purpose of that exhalted body was to make an "exhaustive investigation" to ascertain whether or not there was really any one engaged in profiteering during the World War. Although the commission has not yet reported, it is rumored that it has labored and might possibly surprise Congress and the country by actually making a report this spring or summer. It is also a general rumor that it will astound the world by announcing that profiteering was actually engaged in during the World War. [Applause.] It is further rumored that this report may admonish the profiteers against committing this heinous offense again. It may go so far as to charge that war profiteers were unpatriotic or otherwise naughty. Such a report, if and when made, will be a terrible blow to the consciousless war contractors and, of course, will outlaw the remotest possibility of any such future profiteering.

PROGRAM UNSELFISH AND FAR-REACHING

Mr. Chairman, I desire to say in conclusion that although I have spoken at some length, I have touched only the high spots of this important program in which our veterans and their dependents are so vitally interested. Time does not permit me to mention all of them. It is needless for me to say that I am for all of the program I have outlined and urge on the part of my fellow Members of this House the most earnest consideration of each of the bills I have discussed. Nor do I claim these measures to be all of the American Legion program. Although I do not pretend to speak for the American Legion or other ex-service men's organizations, I am glad to say that I have heretofore supported their program in Congress, and so long as they advocate the betterment of conditions of their disabled buddies, for a reasonable measure of relief for their widows and orphans, and for the preservation of the peace of the world by banishing war profiteering, I shall count it an honor to support such an unselfish and far-reaching program that stands foursquare for God and country. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think we would save time by not discussing the point of order, and I withdraw the point of order made to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. LARSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York by adding the word "farm" before the word "population."

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I accept the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LARSEN to the amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: Before the word "population" where it appears the second time in the amendment insert the word "farm," so that it will read: "that the amount loaned in each State shall be allotted to the States in the proportion that their population bears to the total farm population of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REED of New York) there were—ayes 44, noes 58.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the joint resolution back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and the joint resolution as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural-credit corporations, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the joint resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the joint resolution and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the final passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BACON) there were—ayes 151, noes 35.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I challenge the vote and make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-eight Members are present, a quorum.

So the House joint resolution was passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CORPORATIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on the resolution just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, in the several bills that have come before the House for consideration and action thereon many Members have entertained the fear that the beneficent provisions of the bills might not be as favorably construed for the agricultural interests as many supporters of such bills believe they should be.

The Agriculture Committee of the House, after very careful consideration, has brought before the House for its attention House Joint Resolution 292, which, if enacted into law, will make available $10,000,000 for the purpose of making advances or loans to individuals under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, for the purpose of forming local agricultural credit corporations, livestock-loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks.

As a protection to the Government for such loans, it is provided in such resolution that—

No loans shall be made to individual stockholders on the capital stock of, or to create or increase the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization in an amount in excess of 75 per cent of the par value of the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization by or proposed to be subscribed to by such individual, nor unless such individual shall submit a credit statement which shall be verified by the investigation of the Secretary of Agriculture and shall show that such individual is not indebted in an amount in excess of one-half of the fair market value of his assets and that the value of such assets above such indebtedness shall be at least twice the value of the loan applied for.

A further provision is contained in the bill that no assistance shall be given for the purpose of aiding corporations which are financing or selling special products to the farmers.

It is further provided in the bill that when any of the loans are paid back to the Government the money shall be used as a revolving fund to carry on the purposes provided for in the act.

This legislation should aid materially agricultural credit corporations in responding to the needs of their community. The deflation of agricultural securities, either on real estate or on personal property, has deprived the farmers from securing credit which in normal times they could easily secure. The withdrawal of money from circulation has so reduced the circulating medium that there is not sufficient money to carry on the normal activities in the business world. This has depressed commodity prices, deprived people generally of meritorious credit, and created a lack of confidence in the stability of our financial institutions. Congress at this session has faithfully endeavored to infuse new blood into the economic arteries of the Nation.

The beneficent provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act should enable banks in this country now in process of liquidation, and which were forced to this condition by reason of decline of the value of real estate and property value common to those communities, to rehabilitate, and banks, which are in a weakened condition brought about by the same cause, to financially revive, and thereby protect their depositors, inspire new confidence, and continue to supply a great public necessity for their respective communities.

The amendment to the Federal reserve act, which expands the currency of this country to an approximate amount of $750,000,000, by enabling five or more member banks of such system to secure advances upon their promissory notes, when they are not in possession of other eligible security, should give greater facilities for additional credit and enable them to retain the savings of a lifetime which they are about to lose through foreclosure proceedings.

The passage of the bill to permit the loaning of $10,000,000 to agricultural credit corporations, either for their establishment or the sustaining of existing organizations, should further relieve the stringent credit conditions existing throughout the agricultural communities of this country.

The failure of the aforesaid legislation to operate beneficially to the small banks, small financial institutions, and the farmers will be because of a lack of an understanding on the part of those administering such laws of the real purpose for which such legislation was intended by Congress.

It was, indeed, a surprise to many Members from agricultural sections that the Agriculture Committee of the House refused to act favorably upon the Capper bill for a distribution of 40,000,000 bushels of wheat to the destitute and unemployed people of this country. The storage charges on such wheat held by the Farm Board and the shrinkage loss is daily lessening the value of such wheat, and instead of its loss being consumed in this manner it should be used to relieve the distressed people of our land.

The economic crisis now prevailing must necessarily be met by merciful legislation designed to relieve the financial stringency prevailing throughout the country. Farmers who have been compelled to sell their crops at prices below the cost of production can not pay their taxes and indebtedness, and such condition equitably demands the strengthening support of governmental aid to create a sufficient flow of currency in business activities to insure better commodity prices and thus restore to the farmers of this Nation fair and honest returns for their toil. There will not be a permanent economic recovery until agriculture is placed on a parity with business generally throughout the land.

Our surplus crops are not the full beneficiaries under the tariff laws designed to protect them. While such distressing conditions continue, in order to make the tariff more effective as to such surplus crops, a debenture provision should be enacted into the law to enable one-half of the tariff rate to be reflected in the selling prices of those commodities. The unjust and unfair gambling in stock exchanges, which tends to destroy the values of agricultural commodities through the law of supply and demand, is a dangerous practice, and denies to the producers the rightful results of their honest toil. Organized industry has been able to protect its interests in the field of active competition, while the agriculturalist of this country has been the prey of the speculators and stock-market gamblers.

Congress will not do its full duty unless it responds generously to the cry for relief from the agricultural sections of this country as far as it is possible through legislative action. Economies in all the departments of Government should be practiced to the lowest possible point consistent with the proper functioning of those departments. Salaries of officials in the higher brackets should be reduced to aid in balancing the National Budget. The large deficit in our National Treasury, which requires the levying of taxes to meet the deficit, should be largely borne by taxes on unconscionable incomes of individuals and corporations and by taxes on gifts of large amounts of property, and thereby create to a certain extent a redistribution of the wealth of this country. The excessive tax burdens now being borne by the people of average wealth throughout this Nation should not further be increased by taxes upon the necessities of life and other things of general and common use in their communities. The people who have an unjust proportion of the wealth of this country secure greater benefits under the law, because they have a greater proportion of interest to be protected, and thereby are entitled to share such extra burdens of governmental protection.

The prosperity existing in this country occasioned by the World War created a spending orgy which has built up enormous taxes in the different governmental divisions of our country, and now under the weight and burdens of an economic crisis, we are unable to respond to its obligations. Our present condition demands the thought and wisdom of the people of our Nation and the patriotic and loyal devotion of every citizen in a united effort on the part of all to reach a solution which will preserve the integrity and stability of our Nation.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. STEVENSON, for one week, on account of official business.

TEMPORARY REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS IN THE CAPITOL BUILDING TO THE CORCORAN ART GALLERY

Mr. BANKHEAD, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged report for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 148

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 18, proposing to remove temporarily to the Corcoran Art Gallery for exhibition in the bicentennial portrait exhibit to be held as a part of such celebration, any portraits in the Capitol Building (not in the public corridors), including the following:

George Washington, by Rembrandt Peale, in the Vice President's room;

George Washington, by Gilbert Stuart, in the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee room;

John Marshall, by Martin, in the Supreme Court robing room;

Frederick Muhlenberg, copied from a Wright portrait by Samuel B. Waugh, in the Speaker's lobby; and Oliver Ellsworth, copied from an Earl portrait by Charles Loring Elliott, in the Supreme Court robing room.

That, after general debate, which shall be confined to the concurrent resolution and shall continue not to exceed 20 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Library, the concurrent resolution shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the concurrent resolution for amendment the committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the resolution and the amendment thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 19) entitled "Concurrent resolution providing wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington on February 22, 1932."

REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENTAL DEPARTMENTS (H. DOC. NO. 254)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read, and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Because of its direct relation to the cost of Government, I desire again to bring to the attention of the Congress the necessity of more effective organization of the Executive branch of the Government, the importance of which I have referred to in previous messages. This subject has been considered many times by the Executive and by the Congress, but without substantial results. Various projects are now before the Congress.

The need for reorganization is obvious. There has been with the years a gradual growth of the Government by the accretion in its departments and by independent executive establishments, boards, and commissions as problems requiring solution confront the President and the Congress. To-day the Government embraces from 150 to 200 separate units, dependent on the method of notation used. Governmental units when once set up have a tendency to grow independently of other units. This leads to overlapping and waste. Moreover, there is a marked tendency to find new occupations when the initial duties are completed. The overlap and the number of agencies can be reduced.

A few consolidations, notably in law enforcement and the veterans' services, have been effected. Both of these reorganized agencies have been able to discharge the very greatly increased burdens imposed upon them without such an increase in administrative expense as would otherwise have been the case.

In the present crisis the absolute necessity for the most drastic economy makes the problem of governmental reorganization one of paramount importance. The amount of saving in public funds to be effected by a thoroughgoing reorganization, while difficult to estimate accurately, will be material, amounting to many millions of dollars annually. Not only will the Government's business be conducted more efficiently and economically but the great body of citizens who have business relations with their Government will be relieved of the burden and expense of dealing with a multitude of unnecessary and sometimes widely separated public agencies.

We may frankly admit the practical difficulties of such reorganization. Not only do different fractions of the Government fear such reorganization but many associations and agencies throughout the country will be alarmed that the particular function to which they are devoted may in some fashion be curtailed. Proposals to the Congress of detailed plans for the reorganization of the many different bureaus and independent agencies have always proved in the past to be a signal for the mobilization of opposition from all quarters which has destroyed the possibility of constructive action.

There is little hope for success in this task unless it is placed in the hands of some one responsible for it, with authority and direction to act. Moreover, the consummation of a comprehensive reorganization at one moment is not in the best public interest. Such reorganization should be undertaken gradually and systematically, predicated on a sound and definite theory of government and effectuated as the result of study and experience gained in the actual processes of reorganization.

I recommend, therefore, that the Congress provide for—

(a) Consolidation and grouping of the various executive and administrative activities according to their major purposes under single-headed responsibility, the Congress designating the title of the officer to be placed in immediate charge of such groups as are not now possible under existing organization.

(b) Adoption of the general principle that executive and administrative functions should have single-headed responsibility and that advisory, regulatory, and quasi-judicial functions should be performed by boards and commissions, thus permitting the transfer of certain regulatory functions from executive officials to existing boards or commissions and executive functions from boards and commissions to executive officials.

(c) Authority under proper safeguards to be lodged in the President to effect these transfers and consolidations and authority to redistribute executive groups in the 10 executive departments of the Government or in the independent establishments, as the President may determine, by Executive order, such Executive order to lie before the Congress for 60 days during sessions thereof before becoming effective, but becoming effective at the end of such period unless the Congress shall request suspension of action.

The 10 major executive departments and the major regulatory and financial boards and commissions should, of course, be maintained. Some of these existing agencies are already organized upon the basis of their major purpose, but functions of the same major purpose now outside of these groups should be transferred to them.

It will be necessary also to authorize changes in titles of some officials and to create a few new positions in order to permit grouping and consolidation not now possible. With the enormous growth of governmental business there has been great expansion and diffusion of authority amongst minor officials. At the same time, there is an insufficient number of officials of definite and concentrated responsibility to the public. The additional expense of such officers over and above the salaries now paid to officials who would be displaced would be less than $40,000 per annum. The saving in cost of administration would be many times this sum. The most important of the posts of this character are the following:

Public Works Administrator (new office).

Personnel Administrator (change from chairman of Civil Service Commission).

Assistant Secretary for Public Health (new).

Assistant Secretary for Education (change from commissioner).

Assistant Secretary for Merchant Marine (new office).

Assistant Secretary for Conservation (new office).

Assistant Secretary for Agricultural Research (change from present Assistant Secretary).

Assistant Secretary for Agricultural Economics (change from director).

The establishment of an assistant secretary for merchant marine would enable the consummation of the proposals in my message of December 8 in respect to the Shipping Board.

The public works administration should be partially a service agency to the other departments of the Government, executing certain construction work, the subsequent operation of which should be carried on by those departments. It should be also partially an agency administering certain contract work which can not be delegated to any one department. Naval, military, and some other highly specialized construction work should not be transferred to this agency. The supervision and construction of rivers and harbors work should be continued under the direction of the Army engineers, who should be delegated by the Secretary of War to the service of the administrator of public works for this purpose.

The personnel administration should comprise various agencies relating to the personnel of the Government as a service agency to call departments of the Government. I recommend that the Civil Service Commission should be maintained as an advisory body to the personnel administrator, and the approval of this body should be required in all regulatory questions. The personnel administrator should be the chairman of the commission. Other functions relating to the personnel of the Government should be transferred to the personnel administration as may be deemed wise from time to time.

RECLAMATION SERVICE

With respect to certain agencies in the Government, I recommend a separate legislative reorganization of policy. The first of these is the Reclamation Service. Reclamation should have a broader import than that of bringing unproductive land under cultivation. We do not need further additions to our agricultural land at present. Additional agricultural production except such marginal expansion as present projects warrant is inadvisable.

The conservation of water by storage is required, not alone in the West, but in all parts of the country.

The effective development of water conservation through storage is largely an interstate question in the aid of domestic and industrial water supply, transportation, irrigation, and flood control. Where construction work for storage relates to these larger issues, it is properly the work of the Federal Government. Where water power is developed as a by-product, it should be disposed of in advance by contracts which will fairly reimburse the Government for its outlay. The Reclamation Service should be extended to cover these broad purposes of storage and conservation of water rather than the narrow purpose of irrigation. Such important projects as the dam at Boulder Canyon, the dam at Cove Creek, and the development of the Columbia, should ultimately be undertaken when there is need for such service and when contracts can be made for the sale of power to amortize the cost of construction to the Government. The actual construction work under this plan should be carried out by the public-works administrator and the completed projects administered by the Reclamation Service.

CONSERVATION OF WESTERN RANGES

There should be a change in policy in dealing with public lands if we are to preserve their value for grazing and other purposes. The Committee on Conservation and Administration of the Public Domain, authorized by act of the Congress approved April 10, 1930, completed the task assigned to it a year ago. Its report has been transmitted to Members of the Congress. Legislation carrying into effect the recommendations of the committee also is before the Congress. These proposals are the result of painstaking study and earnest deliberation. They offer a solution of the problems, connected with this remnant of our public domain, which have persisted for the past 25 years. I commend the report to the attention of the Congress, deeming the legislation of sufficient importance to justify early action.

CONCLUSION

In conclusion I can not recommend too strongly that the Congress give the subject of effective organization of the executive branch of the Government its early and serious attention. It is an essential part of a sound reconstruction and economy program. A patchwork organization compels inefficiency, waste, and extravagance. Economy and efficiency can come only through modernization. A proper reorganization of our departments, commissions, and bureaus will result not only in much greater efficiency and public convenience but in the saving of many millions of dollars now extracted annually from our overburdened taxpayers.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 17, 1932.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like to ask whether the Chair is in a position to tell us that it is a fact that during the last Congress no such urgent special message on consolidation and reorganization came from the White House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not advised as to that matter.

Mr. BLANTON. It is very strange, indeed, that the President did not send his Seventy-first Congress such an urgent special message in the last Congress, and I want to call attention to the fact that he had in the last Congress a brutal party majority of 100 Republicans, of the same party as the President, who would have carried out every wish and will of the President at any time, yet he sent us no such urgent special message. I have been fighting for reorganization and consolidation of useless bureaus ever since I came to Congress, but they have been increasing continually during the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover administrations.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address delivered on Lincoln's birthday by Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following speech by Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, at the First Annual Lincoln Day Dinner of the National Capital Republican Club, Friday evening, February 12, 1932, Willard Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

We measure periods by men. Across the middle of the last century falls the long shadow of the towering figure of Abraham Lincoln. But few of those are alive who had the chance to see him in the flesh, but more millions are now influenced by his personality and by what he was able to do than during his own lifetime. His stature increases every year. With the spread of popular government over the earth his name, his wise sayings, his eloquent speeches are a part of the mental equipment of many of the youth of the world. Human institutions have human qualities. They have their good days and their bad days, their illnesses and their periods of convalescence, and when one of those periods of stress and strain comes to popular government men and women look back to Abraham Lincoln.

We know that Lincoln was a bundle of firm muscles and strong emotions, controlled by a powerful, self-disciplined intellect which was keenly susceptible to what we call the spirit. Because of his own struggles and personal experiences and his power of analysis, he had great sympathy and patience and a rare understanding of his fellows. But through all of his tolerance there was a strong, unbending attitude for what he thought of as right. Aware of everything about him, he saw through the fogs of the valley to the bright mountain tops. His feet were held firm on the ground, but, like a beautiful lily, he could reach from the mud to face, unafraid, the open skies.

We face to-day here in this country, where popular government has worked so long and so well, problems in the field of economic and social well-being that approximate in their intensity and importance that period in our Nation's history when Lincoln was at the helm. We can well turn back and study his life and get some of his reactions. He saw so clearly the responsibility, as he put it, for "maintaining in the world that form and substance of government whose leading object is to elevate the condition of men—to lift artificial weights from all shoulders; to clear the paths of laudable pursuit for all; to afford all an unfettered start, and a fair chance in the race of life." He calls attention to the fact that our popular Government has often been called an experiment. He sees this whole process of organization and control which we call Government working itself out here in America on a comparatively new basis. Most vital of all to him was to have it maintained as a geographical unit which he called the Union.

Without unity, he saw this continent repeating the clashing history of Europe. He elbowed out of the way the smaller phases of issues and saw them clear and in the large. To me his most outstanding quality was his capacity to see the results of day-to-day actions in the future. This kept his course true, even though at times he seemed to temporize. To know when to round out programs is as important as to know when to pick fruit. Green plans, like green fruit, cause trouble.

Although he had to develop under war conditions a powerful centralized government, his faith was not in centralized power, but in people. Living at the apex of the government of a great country, his mind was always upon its substantial base. Our kind of government could not exist on an effective basis without effective citizens. How better can the need of strong and self-sustaining local government be expressed than by his statement at Indianapolis preliminary to coming to Washington to take up the Presidency? He says: "I wish you to remember, now and forever, that it is your business, and not mine; that if the Union of these States and the liberties of this people shall be lost, it is but little to any one man of 52 years of age, but a great deal to the 30,000,000 people who inhabit these United States, and to their posterity in all coming times. * * * Constantly bear in mind that not with politicians, not with Presidents, not with office-seekers, but with you, is the question, Shall the Union and shall the liberties of this country be preserved to the latest generation?"

Certainly, as we think over what he has said and turn to our own people in this day of world depression and confusion, we can say to ourselves that the future of our country is in the hands of each individual American citizen. We can not escape by condemning and blaming our legislators and officials.

Naturally enough, Lincoln was not understood. Like all important figures in times of war and confusion he was continually criticized, ostracized, and crucified. A newspaper editor in answering the question of what the vox populi expects of Presidents, said: "All that America expects is a combination of Moses, Demosthenes, St. Paul, and Santa Claus." This may seem like a large contract for any man. There are to-day issues as vital and potent as those that faced our country during the Civil War. We have established governmental mechanisms that give us all certain rights and opportunities. These rights can be destroyed just as readily by undermining and slow attrition as by explosion. It takes planning and deep thought to see that the forces that develop are kept moving in the right direction during periods of strain. We have had a chorus of discord with some of the loudest voices with a strong political note. Complaint, suggestion, vilification almost blot out in their vociferousness sound, sane, and conservative thought and action. One of my friends tells me of a man who had started some false rumors against him but who later came in to borrow some money. When asked why he did so after his previous conduct, he said: "If you want to attack a man you must say something against him, mustn't you?" There is always vagueness in the talk and remedies of those who have no responsibility. Too many of our people have been willing to listen to rumor, fancy, libel and scandal, and talk without thought. There has been a lot of "hollering in the rain barrel."

As I have watched the last few years and have seen Herbert Hoover as the successor of Abraham Lincoln in the White House, I have often thought of what Lincoln said during the war, when he needed to throw off the burden of complaint which was coming in upon him: "Gentleman, suppose all the property you were worth was in gold and you had put it in the hands of Blondin to carry across the Niagara River on a rope. Would you shake the cable or keep shouting at him, 'Blondin, stand up a little straighter—Blondin, stoop a little more—go a little faster—lean a little more to the north—lean a little more to the south'? No; you would hold your breath as well as your tongue and keep your hands off till he was safe over. The Government is carrying an enormous weight. Untold treasures are in their hands; they are doing the very best they can. Don't badger them. Keep silence, and we will get you safe across." The parallel with the present days to those of Lincoln comes readily to us all.

Lincoln had vision and courage. He was not afraid to take an active part in a new venture—the birth of the Republican Party. He thought it was born for a specific task. He gave it his loyal support, even though its early days were not victorious. His leadership gave it an impulse of character which has persisted to the present day. Abraham Lincoln is one of the reasons why I am talking to this Republican meeting. My grandfather was a Jackson Democrat, but my father and his four brothers followed Abraham Lincoln into the new party.

While there is constant evolution and change in our thinking, fundamentally we are about the kind of individuals that built the pyramids, the Roman roads, and the fleets of the British Empire. We work busily at our tasks not realizing that by the multiplication of human beings and by the applications of science we have created world systems in economics and government of new types which are most difficult of operation. A majority of our voters must have brains enough not simply to vote the weather. Our method of government by representation needs to recognize that experts are required if we are to successfully operate what we have constructed. Partisan politics must work within a more restricted area. In that area it should be active and effective. Because we feel competent to sit upon a jury does not mean that we are competent to make decisions where we are not informed. Safety of government to-day depends upon facts, and these facts must be arranged, set in order, and carefully studied.

The mass of facts that pour in upon our President seems too great for human consumption, but he has drawn lines for action that the ordinary opportunist never sees. They follow channels developed in American thinking by long experience. We are on our way to repeat the election of 1864. People then talked and talked and then began to think and think and voted that Abraham Lincoln should stay in office, just as they will do for Herbert Hoover.

PROHIBITION

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Mr. Speaker, it is fortunate for the Nation, as well as for those who have continued to hope that eventually the problems created by prohibition will be solved in a spirit of fairness and to the satisfaction of all concerned, that the resolution upon which we are to vote to-day has reduced the issue to the simplest terms of which it is capable of being reduced.

We are not voting on whether prohibition is desirable or undesirable. We are not voting to determine whether the "noble experiment," as our President has characterized it, has accomplished, or has failed to accomplish, the results that its advocates promised it would. We are not voting to either abolish prohibition or to continue it.

The question before us is on a motion to discharge the Committee of the Judiciary from further consideration of a resolution which merely provides that the people shall have an opportunity to decide for themselves whether they want to continue prohibition, repeal it, or modify it in accordance with the experience they have gained during the 12 years which have elapsed since Federal and so-called "bone-dry" prohibition was adopted as a national policy.

In view of what it proposes, the pending resolution has not only reduced the question to its simplest terms, as I have already said, but it has broadened the basis of the problem to make it one in which the very issue of democratic government itself is involved.

What objection can there be, Mr. Speaker, to permitting the people to pass judgment on a national policy which for 12 years has agitated their minds and has created more feeling, and possibly more bitterness, than any issue known to our national history in a half century?

Those who oppose submitting the question to the people either believe that the people will approve prohibition—in which event they should have no objection, but should feel gratified that they will receive this additional indorsment from the people—or they believe that the people, tired and disgusted with the experiment, will vote to modify or repeal it—in which event they have no legal, moral, political, or constitutional justification for continuing a system which they know the people are opposed to.

Their opposition to the pending resolution is all the more striking when it is recalled that there was a time, and not so very long ago, when the leaders of the prohibition movement were heartily in favor of a referendum.

In 1917 Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, sponsor of the eighteenth amendment, said:

> The Member of Congress who will not vote for the submission of a constitutional amendment to the decision of the States, where it belongs, unless he personally believes it should become a part of the Constitution, usurps the function of the States, arrogates to himself and the Federal Government a prerogative that belongs to the States, and violates the very essence of their sovereignty.

That was in 1917, before he and those for whom he spoke succeeded in securing the acceptance of the amendment. But if it was a usurpation of the functions of the States for a Member of Congress not to vote to submit a constitutional amendment to the States then, is it less of a usurpation not to do identically the same thing now? If it was an arrogation to himself of a prerogative that belongs to the States then, is it less of an arrogation now?

Why this solicitude for democracy and sovereignty in 1917, when the prohibitionists thought they would benefit by such submission, and this lack of interest in democracy and sovereignty in 1932 when there is unmistakable evidence that the people want a change?

What are the objections that the proponents of prohibition raise to the adoption of the pending resolution for the principle of which they once contended? Let us see.

The chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary, one of our leading drys, states that the committee has refused to report the resolution because it would not be proper at this time, when economic problems are pressing for solution, when there is hunger, unemployment, and general economic distress, to inject a highly controversial issue, the effect of which, he states, would be to divide and distract our people.

If this is not the proper time to consider the question, or raise the issue, why have not the chairman and the members of that committee—and the present chairman has been a member of it for many years—permitted any of the bills that were introduced in the previous Congresses to come before the House for a vote?

In each Congress since prohibition became a national problem similar measures, providing for a similar disposition of the matter, were introduced and referred to his committee. The number of such bills increased in each Congress, reflecting a rising tide of resentment which might be stifled for the time being but which had to eventually become so formidable as to compel consideration and action.

Those were years of so-called prosperity, when unemployment was not nearly as serious, when the minds of the people would not have been diverted from pressing economic problems, when they were giving thought and attention to prohibition, when the Law Enforcement Commission appointed by the President was investigating the results of prohibition, when the Nation was discussing the subject and wanted it acted upon.

Yet, in one Congress after another these bills were killed in committee. No excuse was given, none was needed. They had the power, and they were determined to exercise it in defiance of a growing body of thought and sentiment that demanded a new policy and relief from intolerable conditions. To-day, when the strength of the antiprohibition movement, growing from year to year, has reached such proportions that 145 Members of this House, representing 43,000,000 people, have petitioned that the committee be discharged from further consideration of this resolution, the committee has discovered that to bring the resolution out would divert attention from other issues which the members of the committee consider of paramount importance.

The fear, or alleged fear, of diverting the people's minds from other questions by injecting the prohibition controversy is groundless. Their minds are on it, and have been from the time that the fundamental law of the land was distorted from its purpose to include a sumptuary law.

Moreover, it was this fear of the people's minds and judgment that was responsible for the adoption of the measure in the first instance. Fourteen years ago, when the Nation was engaged in a titanic struggle and in the midst of a world war, when 4,000,000 men were in uniform and half that number in or near the firing line 3,000 miles away, when the thoughts of the people were directed at the winning of the war and their minds were preoccupied with their loved ones who had been sent across the sea to face destruction and death, the proponents of national prohibition found that it was an ideal time to secure the enactment of a constitutional amendment.

You may remember the ideal conditions that were predicted as a result of this change. No longer would it be necessary to maintain jails for the confinement of criminals, since the saloon was the cause of all crime and its abolition would abolish crime. No longer would there be distress and poverty, the twin evils, they said, of liquor and the saloon. No longer would homes be destroyed, families disrupted, children orphaned through the tragic death of their parents from alcoholic beverages. No longer would children be brought into the world helpless and crippled mentally and physically because they inherited diseases due to the drunkenness of their parents.

You may remember the posters that were used to portray the ruins that prohibition would put an end to, and the glowing accounts of the highly paid organizers and speakers of the Anti-Saloon League of a new world, a better world, a world in which the millenium will have finally arrived. On the strength of the miracles that prohibition was to work, the dimes and nickels of the gullible were collected in every hamlet and village through the length and breadth of the land. And along with those nickels and dimes came the contributions from the larger corporations, the soft-drink manufacturers, the financial interests that saw more dividends if by any chance prohibition should become effective and enforcible.

I am not going to cite statistics—they are not needed—but who, recalling that beautiful picture of a happy and contented nation freed from the curse of drink, will say that prohibition has emptied the jails, ended divorces, enriched the people, reduced suffering, improved the morals of our people, benefited the younger generations, and made our Nation happier than it was before prohibition?

In spite of all the alleged blessings that were so sure to flow from prohibition, it would not have been incorporated in our national Constitution if the war fever and fervor had not diverted the people's minds to things that at that time seemed to them to be infinitely more serious and important.

Federal prohibition was thus conceived in sin. The popular sentiment necessary to insure the enforcement of the law which revolutionized the customs of our people by legislative fiat was lacking. The prohibitionists knew it was lacking. One of their great leaders, William Jennings Bryan, stated on the public platform when ratification of the amendment seemed imminent that following ratification it would be necessary to educate public opinion to support the measure.

In a democracy the procedure should have been reversed. Public opinion should have first been educated to the need of a Federal amendment, and then the amendment would have followed as a matter of course. But the time was propitious—the minds of the people were centered elsewhere—their hearts were thousands of miles away—and the prohibitionists found that they could conveniently put it over. At least they thought that they had put it over.

What has happened since should be a salutary lesson to all militant minorities who expect to enforce their conception of what is right and wrong and impose their hobby on the people before the people are either willing or ready. They should know that laws can not take the place of reason and education; that law should be the result of reason and education; and that while the process of securing a Federal law might, under certain conditions, be easier, in the long run it will be harder, because public sentiment, which is stronger than all the clubs of all the policemen you can muster—stronger by far than your Army and Navy—does not sustain your law.

Nor is it correct to state, as has the chairman of the committee, that the effect of submitting this proposal to the people will be to divide and distract them.

The division and distraction is here. It is to be found in the new and exceedingly dangerous bootleg industry, where crime is rewarded more richly than it has ever been before. It is to be found in the increasing number of arrests for drunkenness throughout the Nation, in the consumption of poisonous beverages by the young men and young women in the colleges and fraternities, in the general disregard among all classes of people of all law and all civic decency. It is to be found in the corruption which, having taken root with the nation-wide bootleg traffic, has extended itself until it menaces other fields of government. It is to be found in the growing resentment on the part of millions of people who believe in temperance, as I do, and who would like to see real temperance promoted, but who have found that prohibition defeats temperance because it compels people to resort to hard liquors, which it is easy to get, when they might have gotten accustomed to more moderate drinks which prohibition has made it difficult to get.

That division and distraction is not only here, but it will continue, because it can not be stifled the way the committee has stifled all measures designed to remedy the evil, and it will continue until the problem is permitted to come out in the open for a free and frank discussion, after which the people may be permitted to exercise their inalienable right to alter or abolish the prohibition policy.

Whatever the outcome of the vote to-day—and I am under no illusions as to how it will go—there will be other votes on other days, and sooner or later—and I hope sooner rather than later, for the sake of our Nation—a sane policy will be adopted, one which does not provide a remedy that is infinitely worse than the disease it is supposed to cure.

Instead of our present economic condition being a reason for letting the prohibition subject rest, it is one of the best reasons of which I know to modify prohibition right now by restoring beer as a means of raising the revenue we require to balance the Budget. Instead of imposing upon the already overburdened shoulders of the consumers—the workers and farmers—a general sales tax on the things they must have, we can, by imposing a tax of $6 per barrel on legalized beer, derive all that is possible under the sales tax, and without making it more costly for the people to purchase the necessities of life.

We shall, under that plan, do more than balance the Budget without adding to the burdens of the people generally. We shall deliver a fatal blow to the powerful bootleg industry, whose corrupting and criminal influence is becoming a cancerous growth in our body politic, and whose position now ranks high among the major industries of our country.

If you do not wish to embark upon this as a permanent policy, you can limit the period of its operation to three or five years, and at the end of that period continue it, modify it, or abolish it, as the results seem to dictate. It would be an experiment at least as noble as the one from which an increasing number of people are trying to escape, and far more effective, in my judgment, in restoring peace of mind and normal conditions in our national life.

Opponents of the pending resolution state that even if we get sufficient votes to discharge the committee—it will require just a majority of those voting—it would still be impossible to adopt the resolution and send it to the States, because that requires a two-thirds vote.

There was a time when it was impossible to get enough votes to move to discharge the committee. That has now been done. There will come a time when the irresistible force of public opinion, gaining momentum and gathering strength, will compel Members to adopt, by a two-thirds vote, either this resolution or one similar to it. We can save time, and save ourselves a lot of unnecessary and costly delay, by permitting the people now to say whether they want prohibition or are through with it.

That there should be a considerable body of thought in this House which resists the simple proposal to let the people make the decision—the same people who sent us here, and from whom we derive what authority we attempt to exercise in their behalf—to prevent those people, I say, from deciding a question which they consider vital to themselves, their children, and to the Nation, strikes me as amazing—one of many amazing things that have happened since prohibition has become a national issue.

I am opposed to prohibition and all its fruits. I do not believe that Federal "bone-dry" prohibition is desirable, even if it were possible—and I do not think that it is possible, even if it were desirable. I do not believe that the total abstinence which the prohibitionists have sought to enforce is beneficial to us as individuals or as a Nation. If drink injured nations, and abstinence benefited them, the most cultured, the most progressive, the most advanced nations would be the Mohammedan nations, because they are teetotalers, while the most backward nations, intellectually and morally, would be the Christian nations, in most of which the people drink. The reverse happens to be the truth.

Drinking to excess is undoubtedly bad, but so is eating to excess bad, and more people eat to excess than drink to excess. Any excess is bad and dangerous. But to adopt a universal rule to bind all, including those who drink in moderation—and the overwhelming mass of people belong to that class—is to attempt what is unnecessary and impractical. And, as I say, even if it were necessary, I should still consider it impossible.

But if I were as ardently for prohibition as I am against it; if I were as thoroughly convinced that it is a blessing as I am convinced it is a curse; if I were as sure that it brought happiness to the people as I am sure it has brought misery; if I thought that its virtues were more numerous than its vices, and I believe the reverse to be true—I should still wish to have the matter submitted to the people.

Any other course seems inconsistent to me as a believer in our form of government. Our Government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. It required a revolution to establish that principle. The governed are the ones to say, in the last analysis, whether we have their consent or not. That is elementary—too elementary to require elaboration at this time.

I have addressed myself mainly to the question before us to-day. I have not used any mass of statistics, nor have I extended myself on the question of the merits or demerits of prohibition, except as it has been necessary or incidental to the consideration of the pending motion. We can settle one question at a time, but the first question we should settle—because it is the key and the guide to the settlement of so many others—is whether the people have any rights that this body or the Members of it who stand by the present prohibition policy are bound to respect. If it is not settled to-day, it will be settled later on.

THE AMERICAN TARIFF AND ITS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend by remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address delivered by the present Commissioner of Customs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Capt. F. X. A. Eble, United States Commissioner of Customs, before the Harvard Business School Club, Harvard University, Boston, Mass., February 9, 1932:

The subject chosen for my talk is closely associated with the history and development of our country. It is indeed a comprehensive topic. The tariff itself is a very controversial issue.

One of the very first laws enacted by the First Congress under the Constitution was a tariff law. This was the beginning of a long series of tariff acts, which have ever been the storm center of American politics.

The officials charged with the administration of our tariff are too busily engaged with the sundry and intricate problems incident to their colossal tasks to engage in any argumentative discourses on our Nation's policy in this direction. Most of them purposely avoid such discussions, but when sometimes forced into them they endeavor to hold to the "middle mast."

It has been said, and truthfully so, that our tariff laws are the most complicated on our statute books. The present law is no exception. New questions involving changes in classifications and the variance in rates of duties constitute some of the major problems confronting the administrative officers. But these are not all; some of the more important ones will be touched on later.

I shall discuss the principal points of my talk in the following order:

1. A brief history of tariff legislation.
2. Outline of the administrative organization.
3. The 1930 tariff act.
4. The operation and administration of our present tariff law.

HISTORY

When the First Congress of the United States met in New York in 1789 a resolution providing for levying of duties on imported merchandise was one of the first presented. It was introduced by Representative Madison, of Virginia, who later became the fourth President of the United States. This resolution authorized a specific duty on spirituous liquors, tea, coffee, cocoa, sugar, molasses, pepper, cheese, soap, shoes, etc. An ad valorem duty of 5 per cent, based on the value of certain goods at the time and place of importation, was the first application of American valuation, so hotly debated more than a century later.

The Madison resolution was strictly a revenue measure, since the public purse was empty and the country was deeply in debt. But the law, as it was passed three months later, differed radically from the original resolution. The young American industries needed protection. Much discussion ensued, and finally the first tariff law was passed. The act was signed by President Washington on July 4, 1789, and on account of the general rejoicing it occasioned it was hailed as a second Declaration of Independence.

The new duties were declared to be "necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of manufactures." It was hoped that customs collections would yield $3,000,000 of the $8,000,000 needed yearly. During the first and only year of its operation—the duties were increased a year later—it did yield the sum of $2,239,746.75, with an additional $157,376.24 in duties on tonnage.

The Congress, however, made one mistake, for in passing the first tariff law it provided no machinery for the administration. The law was to become effective on August 1, 1789. One day before this the Congress passed another law—its fourth. It was the act of July 31, 1789, creating customs districts and ports of entry and authorizing the appointment of customs officers and prescribing the procedure to be followed in collecting customs duties. So it was on this date that the Customs Service, which is the administrative machinery for collecting the duties, came into existence.

The first vessel to arrive in the port of New York under the first tariff act was the brigantine Persis from Leghorn, with a miscellaneous cargo. The total duties collected on this cargo amounted to $774.71.

Compilation of all customs laws

Such was the modest beginning of tariff legislation and administration. The Congress has since passed many laws imposing duties on imports, but there is no accurate compilation thereof. The Congress authorized a compilation in 1898 and again in 1909. The first volume contains 185 acts, joint resolutions, and proclamations. Of this number, 35 are listed as general tariff acts, with a sufficient enumeration of the articles to require a separate index.

The general counsel of the Bureau of Customs, in Washington, made a very hasty search of the Statutes at Large and other documents on file in his office and found that, since the compilation in 1909, there have been enacted 177 acts, joint resolutions, and proclamations affecting the assessment of customs duties; so that the total number to date is 438. In addition, the President has issued 56 proclamations under the flexible tariff provisions of the acts of 1922 and 1930. Our analysis shows that there have been approximately 39 general revisions.

Inasmuch as this analysis was made hurriedly, I should not care to vouch for its accuracy without further study of the subject. It is very probable that a more careful review would eliminate some of the acts included in our compilation and perhaps add others which we have omitted. Nevertheless, in reviewing these many laws we can not fail to be impressed with the fact that tariff tinkering has been practically a continuous performance of our Congresses. It has become a habit, and habits once formed are usually difficult to overcome.

ORGANIZATION

I shall now discuss the organization which is charged with the administration of the tariff law. This organization is known as the United States Customs Service. Briefly, the organization consists of a bureau headquarters in Washington and a field service. The field service is divided into 48 customs collection districts which are scattered throughout continental United States and its Territorial possessions. The administrative affairs of each district are supervised by a collector of customs. Each district consists of a headquarters port and, in many instances, quite a number of subports of entry; so that the total number of ports of entry in all districts is about 300.

Presidential appointees

At several of the larger ports there are, in addition to the collector, an appraiser, a surveyor, and a comptroller. We have, therefore, in the 48 collection districts a total of 78 field administrative heads. All of these, with two exceptions, are commonly known as "political appointees." That is, they are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and are of the political faith of the party in power. The term of office of these appointees (with the exception of the appraiser, whose term is unlimited) is four years.

However, the rank and file of our service, totaling approximately 10,000 employees, are appointed subject to the rules of the Civil Service Commission.

At various times men whose names are familiar in American history, including one President, have graced the rosters of the Customs Service.

During the early part of the nineteenth century the famous historian George Bancroft was collector of the port of Boston. One of Collector Bancroft's first acts was to appoint as measurer in the Boston customhouse, at an annual salary of $1,500, one of New England's best-known sons and geniuses. I refer to that "rebellious Puritan," that distinguished man of letters from whose pen several of the world's literary classics have flowed, Nathaniel Hawthorne. Shortly after his appointment, Hawthorne, in writing to his friend Longfellow, remarked gaily: "I have no reason to doubt of my capacity to fulfill the duties, for I don't know what they are."

The New England novelist, however, was destined for a higher position in the Customs Service, and four years later the man who gave the world the Scarlet Letter was notified of his appointment as surveyor of the port of Salem under that old veteran of Ticonderoga, Gen. James Miller, collector of the port.

In looking over our list of ex-officers, we also find the name of Edwin A. Robinson, famous contemporary poet. Mr. Robinson was appointed a special agent at the port of New York by the late President Roosevelt. Poet Robinson, by the way, attended Harvard 1891–92.

So you see, my friends, we of the Customs Service are not only revenue collectors but job providers for men of literary and poetical persuasion. Therefore, if there are, perchance, amongst you any whose fettered souls are striving for what the æsthetes are pleased to call "expression," the Customs Service offers a haven of refuge from a world grown cold with commercialism.

Of the 48 customs districts, the district of New York, with headquarters in New York City, is the most important from the standpoint of revenue collected and number of employees. More than one-third of our total force is employed at the port of New York, and more than one-half of our total customs revenue is collected there.

Foreign service

In addition to our bureau in Washington and the field service throughout the United States the Customs Service maintains a foreign force whose headquarters are located in the capitals of the principal European countries. There are also two offices in the Orient. The officials in charge are known as Treasury attachés. These officers are a branch of the investigative unit of the bureau in Washington. This unit, which is the directing office of the Customs Agency Service, constitutes the "eyes and ears" of the commissioner and assists him materially in the detection and prevention of frauds upon the revenue.

To give you an idea of the growth of the service since the beginning of our Government, the collections for the first year amounted to approximately $2,000,000, while during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1929, the service collected in excess of $600,000,000 in customs duties. The major portion of this amount was collected in the form of duties on imported merchandise and only a small portion (less than $5,000,000) was collected from passengers on articles brought in by them as part of their baggage.

THE 1930 TARIFF ACT

This brings me to the third point of my talk, i. e., the tariff act of 1930, which is the law now in force. It is commonly called the Hawley-Smoot law. You will remember that the 1928 tariff platforms of our two major political parties dealt with the tariff, the Republican tariff pledge specifically indicating that a revision of the tariff act of 1922 would be undertaken.

In accordance with the Republican pledge a revision of the tariff was begun early in January of 1929 with hearings before the Ways and Means Committee of the House. The proposed new law was introduced in the House February 27, 1929; passed by the House May 28, 1929; reported in the Senate with amendment September 4, 1929; and passed by the Senate with amendment March 24, 1930. It was a very different measure from that which had passed the House almost a year before; and, in accordance with the usual practice, the bill went to a conference committee made up of an equal number of members of both the Ways and Means Committee and the Finance Committee of the Senate. The differences between the two measures were ironed out and reconciled, and the bill became a law with President Hoover's signature on June 17, 1930, almost 18 months after the revision was begun.

Such, in general, have been the main features in all our recent tariff revisions. So, it seems to me, it can reasonably be said that an American tariff law probably gets a more thorough consideration by the Congress than does any other single piece of legislation.

In the hearings before the committees everyone is given an opportunity to be heard and to present his case; and you will get an idea of the extent to which this is done when I tell you that the record of the hearings before the two committees covers some 18,000 printed pages. I might add at this point that in our recent revisions there has been a decided tendency for the Congress to rely less and less on the data submitted at these hearings and to frame the bill in consultation with the Government experts of the Tariff Commission and of the Treasury Department.

The law has two principal divisions; the rate structure comes first—15 dutiable schedules and a free list. These schedules are on the basis of broad commodity classifications, such as chemicals, metals and manufactures thereof, agricultural products, wool and its manufactures, and sundries. These schedules and the free list occupy about half the total pages in the law—107 out of a total of 194. The remaining 90 pages make up the second principal division of the law and consist of the various administrative provisions which set forth in rather elaborate and detailed manner the technique by which the law is to be administered and enforced.

It is this enforcement and administration which will be the principal subject of my discussion to you, inasmuch as my duties and responsibilities as Commissioner of Customs give me an intimate contact and association with this division of our tariff law.

In passing, let me mention here that the last revision was the first one in our history in which these administrative sections were revised and gone over by the Congress as completely as were the rate schedules.

In previous revisions a few specific administrative provisions were considered by the Congress in the course of the revision, but prior to the revision of 1929–30, an American tariff revision was essentially and almost completely a revision of the rate structure. As a matter of fact, prior to the act of 1913 no administrative sections were incorporated as a part of the tariff acts passed by the Congress; and it was not until the act of 1922 that the administrative provisions were incorporated in an extensive way.

OPERATION AND ADMINISTRATION OF PRESENT TARIFF LAW

I shall now discuss the last and most important feature of my talk. The administration of our tariff law is the joint responsibility of three of the executive branches of the Government—the Treasury Department, the Department of Justice, and the Tariff Commission. (The Department of Commerce might be mentioned as a fourth in connection with its work in the compiling and publication of the voluminous statistical records of our import trade.) Of these three branches—Treasury, Justice, and Tariff Commission—the Treasury Department has by far the largest sphere of activity; and the Bureau of Customs, of which I happen to be the chief, is a unit of the Treasury Department.

We admit imported merchandise into this country; we examine, appraise, and classify it for duty purposes, collect the duty, and turn the merchandise over to the importer. In the conduct of this activity we are called upon many times a day to make rulings, decisions, and regulations covering the thousand and one moot points which arise between the arrival of the imported merchandise at one of the ports of entry and the final ascertainment and the collection of the duty accruing on these imports. I shall come back to our work again, but let me first dispose of the functions and the activities of the Department of Justice and of the Tariff Commission in that order.

Department of Justice activities

The work of the Department of Justice as it relates to the Customs Service falls into two categories. The first has to do with the criminal provisions of the customs laws and such civil provisions, penal in nature, as require judicial determination. This so-called customs penal code is an accumulation of law, precedent, and regulation built up over the last 140 years to deal with violations of the customs laws involving fraud and smuggling. In this activity the work of the Department of Justice is conducted by the United States attorneys in the various judicial districts, the United States district courts, the United States circuit courts of appeals, and the Supreme Court of the United States.

The second and more familiar activity of the Department of Justice is evident in the work of the customs courts, whose jurisdiction covers all decisions of the collectors and appraisers as to the classification, rates of duty, and value of imported merchandise. As an indication of the importance of this aspect of tariff administration, the annual report of the United States Attorney General for the last fiscal year shows the following:

TARIFF COMMISSION ACTIVITIES

Now, with regard to the Tariff Commission, which is a separate branch of the executive department directly accountable to the President. Historically, our experience with tariff commissions goes back to 1882, with the appointment by the Congress of a commission to accumulate and prepare data for the tariff revision of 1883. After a lapse of a quarter century the commission principle was again revived with the appointment in 1909 of the so-called Taft Tariff Board, which continued to function as an investigatory branch of the Government until 1912, when it became defunct due to the failure of the Congress to provide funds for its continuance.

The present Tariff Commission was established in 1916 under a revenue law of that year; and it, too, was originally established as an investigatory body to provide the Congress with data for use during congressional revisions of the tariff. The commission is a bipartisan body made up of six men—three Republicans and three Democrats. Your own Prof. Frank W. Taussig was the first chairman of the commission.

With the passage of the Fordney-McCumber Act of 1922, the commission was given a new and very important function, which has been continued under the present Hawley-Smoot law. This is the so-called flexible-tariff feature of the law, by which the commission is authorized to determine such changes in existing rates of duty as may be necessary to equalize the difference between foreign and domestic costs of production. The commission reports its findings to the President, who makes them effective by presidential proclamation, adjusting, either up or down within a 50 per cent limitation, the rates of duty in the law in accordance with the cost of production formula.

Proposed amendment to present law

Right here I might digress long enough to tell you that the proposed amendment to the tariff law, which has already passed the House and is now before the Senate, provides for certain changes in the technique of flexible-tariff-rate adjustments and for the calling by the President of an international economic conference to consider the tariffs of the world. The Treasury Department has gone on record before both tariff committees of the Congress on this proposed new law as regarding it unwise and unnecessary legislation. The principal change proposed in the flexible-tariff procedure by this measure would make the commission report its findings to the Congress instead of the President. It is the contention of the Treasury, as expressed by Secretary Mills, that this would destroy all flexibility in the tariff law, would have a tendency to freeze all the present rates (however much they might be in need of adjustment, either up or down) and would keep the tariff continually before the Congress.

The department is opposed to the international-conference proposition also on the theory that our tariff policy should not be the result of international bargainings but should be established by the Congress, which alone should have control of it.

Mr. Mills stated that "if the members of this committee and the Members of the House of Representatives, whose constitutional duty it is to initiate tariff legislation, believe that our present tariff structure is too high in the interest of the people of the United States, then I submit it is their duty to act on that belief and not refer this matter, without instructions, to an international body."

Secretary Mills also voiced the opposition of the administration and the Treasury Department to the provision which authorized the President to negotiate with foreign governments reciprocal trade agreements under a policy of mutual concessions. Mr. Mills stated in substance that if it is to be the policy of the Government to negotiate treaties, he believed the practice followed in the past should be continued, and that we can profitably follow the excellent recommendations of President Roosevelt contained in his annual message to the Congress in 1901, which were as follows:

"Reciprocity must be treated as the handmaiden of protection. Our first duty is to see that the protection granted by the tariff in every case where it is needed is maintained, and that reciprocity be sought for so far as it can safely be done without injury to our home industries. Just how far this is must be determined according to the individual case, remembering always that every application of our tariff policy to meet our shifting national needs must be conditioned upon the cardinal fact that the duties must never be reduced below the point that will cover the difference between the labor cost here and abroad. The well-being of the wageworker is a prime consideration of our entire policy of economic legislation."

Mr. Mills also quoted from the Tariff Commission's report of December 4, 1918, on reciprocity and commercial treaties which was submitted to Congress by Chairman Taussig, as follows:

"Finally, it can not be too much emphasized that any policy adopted by the United States should have for its object, on the one hand, the prevention of discrimination and the securing of equality of treatment for American commerce and for American citizens, and on the other hand the frank offer of the same equality of treatment to all countries that reciprocate in the same spirit and to the same effect. The United States should ask no special favors and should grant no special favors. It should exercise its powers and should impose its penalties not for the purpose of securing discrimination in its favor but to prevent discrimination to its disadvantage."

So much for this proposed legislation, reference to which is timely, I think.

With this résumé of the activities and functions of the Department of Justice and of the Tariff Commission in the administration of the tariff act, I return to the work of the Treasury Department.

I shall not burden you with anything like a detailed recital of our functions, responsibilities, and activities; but in order to give you an idea as to the scope and character of these, I shall discuss certain of the more important phases of our administration of the law.

Rates of duty

The rates in the dutiable schedules of the tariff act are specific, ad valorem, and a combination of both, known as compound. The specific rates, being on a basis of some unit of physical measurement or volume, as a pound, a yard, or a bushel, are relatively simple of administration.

Regarding the ad valorem rates, however, the situation is quite different. Obviously the assessment of these duties requires first of all a determination of the value on which they are to be based. The practice throughout the various countries of the world with regard to the assessment of ad valorem duties is by no means uniform. Some countries assess these duties on the value of imported merchandise after it has been imported, while others, including the United States, use what is known as "foreign value" as the fundamental basis for the assessment of ad valorem duties.

Foreign value

Foreign value, briefly, is the equivalent of the wholesale selling price of the merchandise in its country of origin or production packed ready for shipment, and it is on this value base that most of our ad valorem duties are assessed.

All this sounds quite simple, but I wish it were in fact as simple as it sounds. Our work in connection with the determination of value for the assessment of ad valorem duties is without a doubt one of our most important activities, and I shall therefore begin this discussion of certain of the important details of the administration of the tariff with a consideration of the problems incident to the determination of the dutiable value of imported merchandise.

Section 402 of the act of 1930 enunciates the law by which we are guided and governed. Our problems begin with the first provision of this section, in which the Congress has provided that the fundamental basis for the assessment of our ad valorem duties shall be either the foreign value or the export value of the merchandise, whichever is higher. I have explained foreign value as the equivalent of the wholesale selling price of the merchandise in the country of origin.

Export value

Export value is the price of the merchandise in the country of origin for exportation specifically to the United States, and we are required to determine which of these two is the higher and to use it. It frequently happens, for any one of a number of reasons which I shall not take your time to discuss here, that in the case of certain imported merchandise there is no foreign market value and no export value. Where this is the case the law provides that we shall assess duty on the basis of its United States value.

United States value

United States value, briefly, is the wholesale selling price of the imported merchandise in this country less certain deductions which the law enumerates. These dutiable bases, you might think, would meet about every situation likely to arise; but, as a matter of fact, they do not, and the law provides for two other value bases, making five in all.

Cost of production

Occasionally it happens that we are unable to determine foreign value, export value, or United States value for a particular importation. In this event the law requires us to determine dutiable value on the basis of the cost of production of the merchandise. In this connection you will readily appreciate the difficulties of determining the cost of production of an article made, say, some place in Czechoslovakia or in the interior of China. However, cost-of-production investigations are very rare, probably not more than one in a thousand.

American selling price

The fifth value base, that of American selling price, is the wholesale selling price of the American-made product comparable with the imported merchandise, and is for use only in certain cases. and I shall not complicate my discussion unnecessarily by going into that here.

It is in the establishment of foreign values that the agents of the customs foreign service render very valuable assistance to our appraising officers. If any United States appraising officer is uncertain as to the real or market value of any imported foreign commodity, he sends a request to the department that an investigation be made, and this in turn is forwarded to the Treasury attaché stationed in the country from which the merchandise was exported to the United States.

This gives you, briefly, an indication of the problems with which we are daily confronted in the assessment of ad valorem duties on imported merchandise.

ANTIDUMPING LAW

There is in connection with our valuation work one other very important function of the Treasury Department. This has to do with the administration of the antidumping act, which was passed as a part of the emergency tariff act of May, 1921. Our work on this score is in addition to that which I have just indicated above as necessary in order to assess our ad valorem rates in accordance with the law.

Dumping, as defined in the act of May, 1921, is the selling of foreign merchandise in the markets of our country for less than its foreign value which, as I indicated above, is practically the equivalent of the wholesale selling price in the country of origin of the foreign merchandise. Our law is based on the theory that dumping is an uneconomical and predatory practice not to be countenanced in our markets any more than is predatory price-cutting on the part of an American producer who might seek thereby to secure a monopoly of the domestic market.

In order to find "dumping," two facts must be ascertained—first, that merchandise has been sold at less than its fair value; and, second, that an American industry has been injured, is likely to be injured, or is prevented from being established.

The question of injury has always been a very irksome one, it being very difficult at times to establish. An amendment to the antidumping act has been introduced in the House of Representatives by Mr. HAWLEY, of Oregon, eliminating the injury feature. If this amendment becomes law, the administration of our antidumping act will be much simpler and the act will be along the lines of the present Canadian antidumping law.

Depreciated currency (dumping?)

At this point I wish to invite your attention to a form of indirect dumping which various industries of our country are facing to-day. I refer to the fact that more than 40 per cent of our total importations of free and dutiable merchandise are coming from countries (excluding China) which have abandoned the gold standard of currency. England discontinued the gold standard on September 21, 1931, and merchandise is still being imported in many instances at prices which prevailed previous to that date. In some instances slight advances in prices have occurred, but not in the same ratio as the currency has depreciated.

Let me illustrate by using high-grade china clay as an example. One hundred and thirty-five thousand two hundred and ten tons of this commodity were imported during the calendar year 1931. On September 20, 1931, the price was £20 a ton ($97.20 in United States currency converted at $4.86). This was subject to a duty of $2.50 a ton, making the landed value $99.70 a ton. On January 18, 1932, a shipment arrived at the port of New York invoiced at the same price in English currency, i. e., £20 a ton; but on conversion into United States currency at $3.47, the prevailing rate of exchange on date of importation, we have a price of $69.40 a ton, as compared with $97.20 a ton for the same merchandise imported the day before England abandoned the gold standard. The decrease in value is 27.9 per cent. While it is true the depreciation of the English currency has no effect on our revenue in this instance, as the rate of duty is specific, nevertheless, there are many other commodities subject to ad valorem rates of duty where the decrease in customs revenue averages approximately 30 per cent.

It is obvious, therefore, with regard to merchandise subject to an ad valorem rate of duty, that the protection heretofore afforded domestic industry has been automatically wiped out in the ratio of the depreciation.

Although the Bureau of Customs has received many complaints from American manufacturers in which they state they are being injured through importations arriving from countries which have abandoned the gold standard, the department is helpless as the present antidumping act does not contain any provision which could be applied.

I noticed in the press the other day that Germany has issued a decree authorizing customs officers to apply compensatory duties in the case of commodities imported from countries which are on a depreciated-currency basis.

In a personal note which I recently received from Dr. E. W. Kemmerer, that eminent economist and financial expert, of Princeton, he comments on the situation as follows:

"I believe that the artificial stimulation of export trade by means of currency inflation is a policy that in the long run hurts the country adopting it; for it exploits home labor and results in the country's giving an increasing amount of its own home products for a decreasing amount of foreign products. However, I think that for a short time it strengthens the country's power to compete with other countries for foreign markets. In this way it acts like a sort of an export bounty and in its effects is like 'dumping.' It really is not a fair kind of competition. It is 'punching below the belt.' In the case of imports from countries adopting this policy, I think it would be perfectly logical for countries remaining on the gold standard to apply the principles of 'antidumping' regulations."

You see at once the work which devolves upon us in the administration of this antidumping law. We are required to determine whether or not dumping does in fact exist; and this, you will appreciate, calls for an elaborate investigation, both abroad and in this country, in order to determine whether or not the imported merchandise is being offered in our markets for less than it is sold abroad. The burden of this work falls upon this same far-flung organization of the Treasury Department to which I referred above, and frequently calls for no inconsiderable ability, resourcefulness, tact, and diplomacy on the part of our agents.

Such in summary are the principal problems and certain of the more important details in our valuation work.

I shall now refer to one or two other important sections in the administrative provisions of the tariff act.

MARKING PROVISIONS OF THE LAW

Section 304 of the act of 1930 requires that all imported merchandise capable of being marked without injury shall be marked with the country of origin. We in the Treasury Department have the responsibility of carrying out the intent of the Congress in enacting this provision. This means deciding which merchandise is to be marked and which is not, and it means the assessment of an additional duty of 10 per cent on all imported merchandise which should be marked and is not.

One of the most important cases which came before us recently under this provision involved the importation of some 400 tractors through the port of Baltimore. A few years ago our customs courts decided that tractors were entitled to duty-free entry into this country on the theory that they are agricultural implements. Subsequent to this decision—I do not say as the result of it—the company in question abandoned entirely the manufacture of tractors in this country and transferred its whole tractor manufacturing organization to Cork, Ireland. The consignment of tractors of which I speak came from Ireland and were not marked with the country of origin. We decided that they should be marked, and required the attachment of a plate to each machine showing that it was made in Ireland, and assessed the 10 per cent duty specified by the law for failure to mark.

You have no idea of the innumerable instances in which the provisions of this marking law are involved. In many cases an importer is only too glad to comply with the requirements, believing that the country-of-origin mark gives his merchandise a considerable prestige value. Leather luggage from England, for example, seems to have such a prestige value, and, accordingly, we have little difficulty with such merchandise. In the case of many other commodities, however, the importer apparently would prefer not to reveal the country of origin of the merchandise, and in the case of such imports our job is one of constant scrutiny and supervision. In administering this provision of the law, as well as all similar provisions, the department's foreign representatives cooperate in every way possible with foreign producers shipping goods to this country in order that their merchandise may, upon its arrival here, comply with our regulations.

CONVICT AND INDENTURED LABOR

I shall now discuss another important administrative section in the tariff act, section 307, relating to the importation of merchandise produced by convict, forced, or identured labor. The fundamental principle of this provision is not new; our tariff law has provided for an embargo on the importation of convict-made merchandise since 1890. This fundamental principle, however, was broadened and extended considerably during the last revision, so that the prohibition previously applicable to convict-made merchandise is now extended to merchandise made by forced or indentured labor under penal sanction—in other words, labor not voluntarily performed on the part of the laborer.

With regard to merchandise made by such forced or indentured labor, however, the act provides that the prohibition shall not be applicable in the case of imported merchandise not produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to meet our consumptive demand. To state the provisions of the law, even as I have paraphrased them, is at the same time to indicate our problem.

In the case of convict-made merchandise, we have only to establish that convict labor has entered into the production of a particular importation under consideration; but when we deal with merchandise made with forced or indentured labor, our problems and difficulties are greatly multiplied.

Simple as it may seem on the surface, it is far from routine procedure to establish definitely where free labor ends and forced or indentured labor under penal sanction begins. In endeavoring to settle this fact you will, of course, understand that we are necessarily dealing always with a foreign people, foreign customs, and foreign economic systems. There is still extant in various foreign countries a type of economic organization which, it seems to me, can only be described as a survival of the system of serfdom of the Middle Ages; and I think all of you will have some hesitancy in deciding whether or not a serf or a peon is a forced laborer.

Consumptive demand

But even if we clear this hurdle and are able to establish satisfactorily that a particular importation is the product of forced or indentured labor under penal sanction, we still have the greater problem as to whether or not the product is produced in the United States in sufficient quantities to meet the consumptive demand of our people. You, of course, with your economic background, appreciate the true significance of the demand concept; you recognize it not as a fixed, unvarying, and constant amount or volume, but as an extremely sensitive, widely fluctuating variable—a variable which changes almost from day to day as the price of a commodity fluctuates, and a variable which changes from period to period as a result of seasons, good times and bad, new inventions, style changes, and a host of other causes.

Recognizing the almost impossible character of the task of establishing a theoretical consumptive demand for a product, we have, nevertheless, to determine what is practically and reasonably the consumptive demand for a commodity. This we do by determining the average demand for the commodity over a recent period of years and comparing this figure with our statistics on domestic production. But this is only used as a basis for our determination, as in the last analysis our determination is based upon the production in a given year, calendar or fiscal, as against demand for the following year.

This very problem has come before us recently in a most elaborate and involved form. The commodity is wrapper tobacco used in the manufacture of cigars. Our principal foreign source is the Dutch East Indies from which comes the Sumatra wrapper tobacco familiar to most of you, and which, of course, is in direct competition with the wrapper tobacco grown here in New England, especially in the Connecticut Valley.

Our investigation established the fact that much of this foreign wrapper tobacco is the product of indentured labor under penal sanction; and we, accordingly, had next to settle the question as to whether or not our domestic production is sufficient to meet the consumptive demands.

The ascertainment of this truth has been complicated in the extreme, due to the character of the product itself. The total production of wrapper tobacco is a highly variable quantity from season to season. The yield from each crop is dependent upon certain factors which combine to increase or decrease the number of leaves on the stalks suitable for wrapper use.

After an exhaustive investigation the department found that our domestic production of wrapper tobacco is not sufficient to meet the consumptive demands, and we accordingly ruled that Sumatra wrapper tobacco is entitled to importation.

IMPORTATIONS FROM RUSSIA

This same section 307 and our administration of it have been prominently before the country recently in connection with the importation of merchandise from Russia. I need not here enlarge upon the uncertainty of conditions in Russia as we know them, or upon the very unreliable character of most of what purports to be accurate information concerning conditions within the Soviet boundaries. As a nation, of course, we have no official or diplomatic relations with Russia, and as a consequence our investigative agents do not enter that country. We therefore have to use the best and most reliable of the data concerning Russia available to us; and on the basis of this about a year ago it seemed to us that certain merchandise coming to this country from Russia was the product of convict labor.

Burden of proof on importer

The law which became effective January 1, 1932, requires strict enforcement of the new prohibition against the importation of forced-labor merchandise. It is both proper and reasonable, in view of the circumstances surrounding the Russian situation, to place upon the importer of suspected merchandise the burden of proving that such merchandise is not the product of forced labor. Unless the importers are able to establish by a preponderance of evidence that their merchandise was not produced in prison encampments or penal colonies, such merchandise shall be denied entry at our ports.

This is the policy which governs our administration of these provisions of the tariff law. There are still various other provisions, some of which are quite complicated and require careful and judicious treatment. I shall not burden you with any more of these problems, for I believe you now have a fairly good idea of the task which rests upon the Treasury and customs officials in administering the tariff act.

Many of you, perhaps most of you, know something of the size and volume of our import trade, but let me, nevertheless, begin with a few statistics of a general character.

During the Fordney-McCumber law, which was in force from September, 1922, to June, 1930, the total importations into this country were valued at $31,000,000,000, of which twenty billion came in free of duty and eleven billion subject to duty.

During the first 16 months of the Hawley-Smoot law our total importations were valued at $3,000,000,000, of which two billion came in free of duty and nine hundred and ninety million subject to duty.

I shall refer entirely to the dutiable portions, which, of course, are as varied as the merchandise described in the act. The counts of the number of rates of duty in the tariff law vary from 3,000 to almost 30,000, depending upon the basis used by the enumerator, and all too often upon his purpose.

The 3,000 count is more indicative of the number of rates in our law, inasmuch as the larger counts involve more or less duplication such as you get, in striking fashion, in some of the cotton-cloth paragraphs, where there are a number of different rates in the one paragraph, depending upon the count of the cloth.

But whether the count be 3,000 or 30,000 makes little difference for our purposes, inasmuch as all dutiable merchandise is "grist for our mill," and a little later on I shall refer to the number of rates merely to give you an idea of the size and character of our job.

I have endeavored to indicate to you the technique by which a tariff law is administered and certain of the important problems which are to us a part of our daily lives. In all of this I have intended no consideration of the merit or demerit of our tariff policy; no argument as between protection on the one hand and free trade or a competitive tariff on the other. These are questions and considerations which are no part of our administration of the tariff law. They are wholly within the province of the Congress which, in passing the tariff act, lays down our tariff policy.

Our tariff policy has been a vital political issue for so long and the subject of such a violent controversy for more than a century that every schoolboy in the land begins to have a tariff attitude and a tariff viewpoint long before he has a vote by which to express this attitude and viewpoint.

I have reached my conclusions concerning our tariff policy on the basis of my tariff experience both in this country and for many years as a Government representative abroad, which latter experience brought me into intimate contact with the economic conditions in the various foreign countries.

In what I say I shall ignore completely any discussion of the theory of free trade as being entirely beside the point. In justification of this I assure you that with regard to the doctrine of free trade as a theory I have no argument and no dispute; I regard it theoretically as wholly unassailable. My objection to it lies in its impracticability in view of the widely divergent economic conditions prevailing throughout the world.

Professor Taussig's views on the rayon industry

I believe much of the economic development of this country during the past hundred years has been due, in no inconsiderable measure, to our policy of a protective tariff, under which we have fostered and developed our industries. In my perusal of Professor Taussig's new edition of his book, Some Aspects of the Tariff Question, I noted with particular interest his new chapter on Rayon. After a brief but fascinating account of the development of this great industry, he says, on page 428: "It seems almost indisputable that the tariff was responsible for the establishment of the (rayon) industry in the United States." Later, on page 433, he says:

"To sum up: The duty on rayon brought into the United States a new and important industry, one which would seem to illustrate the type justifying protection in this country during the early stages—an industry for which there are neither climatic nor geographic disadvantages; which is adapted to large-scale standardized production, with the use of machinery and relatively little hand labor; and in which, at the start, the difficulties are great, the technique of production being so difficult as to require an experimental period of many years before an adequate technical staff and labor force can be developed."

Were I any place but right here at Harvard, I ought, perhaps, to give more of the context than I have surrounding these two statements, but under the circumstances I feel sure this is unnecessary.

Needless to say I agree completely with these statements Professor Taussig makes concerning the development of the rayon industry in this country. I might add that I think exactly the same conclusions are possible with regard to our great tin-plate industry with an annual output to-day in excess of $200,000,000, and also with regard to our whole chemical industry in the development of which, in less than 10 years, we have transferred ourselves from a Nation dependent, even to the extent of our national existence, upon foreign chemical sources into a chemical-producing Nation independent of the rest of the world.

The tariff has done some things over which there can be no disagreement. However, I am sorry that I disagree with Professor Taussig's splendid article entitled "What the Tariff Has Done to Us," which appeared in the November, 1931, issue of the Atlantic Monthly.

Mr. Taussig states:

"The extremes to which our system has been carried are familiar enough. In the days before the Great War the only country which went as far as we did was Czarist Russia. I am not sure just where we stand now in the competition for this sort of bigness. Our example has infected the rest of the world (about this, more presently), and other countries may have bettered our instruction. It is not easy to make comparison of the general or average height of highly complicated tariff rates of different countries; but I should be surprised if those of any among the so-called civilized countries outran ours.

"There has been, at all events, during the last decade a kind of change—a new sort of development—which is significant of the way we have pushed up and up. This appears in the very high ad valorem duties which are scattered here and there in the tariff acts of 1922 and 1930. A few illustrations will point the lesson. On children's toys (which the Germans, as it happens, make in great variety and with much ingenuity) the duty is 70 per cent on the value. Some kinds of dollies are hit even harder; they are put at 90 per cent. Some women's garments pay 75 per cent. Other things much used by the gentle sex—veils, veilings, ruchings, insertions, an extended and very meticulously listed range of articles, embellished in ways that attract the users—pay 90 per cent. Laces also pay 90 per cent.

"Now, these rates are unprecedented; not so much as regards the effective height but as regards the overt and fairly unblushing form of statement."

In order to answer Professor Taussig on this point, and also to enable you to visualize more clearly the passage of importations through the customs and to indicate to you the competitive character of this merchandise, I have selected as exhibits a number of samples of various commodities.

Each exhibit I have here before me comprises two samples—the domestic article and the competitive imported article. All of the imported articles arrived at the port of New York and the prices shown were taken from the files of the customhouse and include duty and transportation. The prices given on the domestic articles were represented to me as bare cost of production, excluding overhead and profit.

EXHIBIT 1.—"Hit and miss" cotton rag rug, size 2 feet by 3 feet

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (each) $0.28
b. Imported (from Japan)—landed cost (each) ..... .09
(Dutiable under par. 921—75 per cent ad valorem.)

We have here two rugs, one imported from Japan at a landed cost (including duty and transportation charges) of nine cents; the other a domestic rug, represented to me to cost 28 cents to manufacture. Both rugs are known to the trade as the "hit and miss" variety of rag rug.

I am going to ask you, gentlemen, to visualize the class of labor employed in making each of these rugs, and the standard of living of each class of workmen, i. e., the Japanese workman and his American brother; their home surroundings, the clothing they wear, and the luxuries they enjoy. In the first place, the rate of pay of the American laborer is from three to four hundred per cent higher than the wage scale in Japan; the American lives in a better home, he has better food, wears better clothing, and enjoys various luxuries which are denied the Japanese worker.

Please remember that the 9-cent rug is landed here, transportation and duty being included in that price. The duty is 75 per cent. You could add another 200 per cent and the landed cost would still be under the American price.

Of course, this might seem an extreme case; but I assure you it is not an exceptional one. There are hundreds of items landing in our country to-day subject to apparently high rates of duty, but our American industries receive little or no protection. Then, again, we see merchandise being imported at depreciated currency prices, and the effect of the high rates in many instances has been vitiated.

I have other samples here, but I am not going to comment on them as I have done in this case. I shall merely mention them and place the articles before you.

EXHIBIT 2.—Cotton suede cloth, 36 inches wide

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (yard) $0.567
b. Imported (from Czechoslovakia)—landed cost (yard) .. .479

(Dutiable under par. 904 at 22 per cent, based on average yarn number.)

EXHIBIT 3.—Men's leather gloves

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (dozen pairs) $26.00
b. Imported (from England)—landed cost (dozen pairs) .. 24.89

(Dutiable under par. 1532 at $11 a dozen pairs as hand sewed, but not less than 50 per cent.)

EXHIBIT 4.—Briarwood pipe

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (per 100) $24.00
b. Imported (from Italy)—landed cost (per 100) 19.25

(Dutiable under par. 1552 at 5 cents each and 60 per cent ad valorem.)

EXHIBIT 5.—Canvas shoes

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (pair, sizes 6 to 12) .. $0.38
b. Imported (from Japan)—landed cost (pair, sizes 6 to 12) . .27½

(Dutiable under par. 1530 (e), 35 per cent ad valorem.)

EXHIBIT 6.—Thumb tacks

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (per 100) $0.049
b. Imported (from Germany)—landed cost (per 100) ..... .025

(Dutiable under par. 331 at 3 cents a pound.)

EXHIBIT 7—Metal toy

a. Domestic, cost of manufacture (each) $0.45
b. Imported (from Japan), landed cost (each) ..... .30

(Dutiable under par. 1513, 70 per cent ad valorem.)

With your indulgence, I should like to discuss briefly Exhibit 7. A duty of 70 per cent ad valorem is imposed upon the foreign article. Professor Taussig, in his recent paper in the Atlantic Monthly, comments on this class of merchandise with, "A few illustrations will point the lesson." Here is the illustration in concrete form, and I am going to let you, gentlemen, decide whether the present rate of 70 per cent is too high on this merchandise. It would take an additional 50 per cent duty to bring the landed cost of the foreign article on a par with the production cost of the competitive domestic article.

EXHIBIT 8—Woolen hoods

a. Domestic, cost of manufacture (dozen) $3.65
b. Imported (from Italy), landed cost (dozen) 2.42

(Dutiable under par. 1115 (b) and T. D. 44715, 40 cents a pound and 55 per cent ad valorem; approximate weight, 1¾ pounds per dozen.)

EXHIBIT 9—Knives and forks

a. Domestic, cost of manufacture (set of 6 table knives and forks) $7.42
b. Imported (from England), landed cost (set of 6) 4.81

(Dutiable under par. 355 at 8 cents each and 45 per cent ad valorem.)

EXHIBIT 10.—Electric light bulbs

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (per 100) $2.35
b. Imported (from Japan)—landed cost (per 100) 1.55

(Dutiable under par. 229, 20 per cent ad valorem.)

EXHIBIT 11.—Fireman's hat badge

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (each) ..... .15½
b. Imported (from England)—landed cost (each) ..... .10

(Dutiable under par. 397, 45 per cent ad valorem.)

EXHIBIT 12.—Golf ball

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (dozen) 6.00
b. Imported (form England)—landed cost (dozen) based on depreciated currency 3.21

Using the normal rate of exchange, the cost of the foreign article, including duty, would only amount to $5.10 a dozen as compared with a cost of $6 a dozen for the domestic article, which results in the differential of about 16 per cent in favor of the foreign article. Using the present rate of exchange, there is a difference of about 46½ per cent in favor of the imported golf ball.

Now I shall take up the last of my exhibits. The samples represent a commodity known as "allover lace." The rate of duty to which this class of merchandise is subject amounts to 90 per cent. This is one of the high rates referred to in Mr. Taussig's article in the Atlantic Monthly.

EXHIBIT 13.—Allover lace

a. Domestic—cost of manufacture (yard) $0.80
b. Imported (from England)—landed cost (yard) based on depreciated currency ..... .46

Even using the normal rate of exchange, the cost of the foreign lace, including duty, would only amount to 65 cents a yard, as compared with a cost of 80 cents a yard for the domestic article, which results in the differential of about 20 per cent in favor of the foreign article.

It is significant to note that notwithstanding the fact that the foreign lace bears a duty of 90 per cent, it is sold at a price considerably below that of the domestic article. The need for a high protective tariff on goods of this nature is readily apparent. For instance, if there were no duty whatever on lace of this kind, the imported article could be bought at 34 cents a yard, based on the normal rate of exchange, and 24 cents a yard at the present rate of exchange.

I believe, as evidenced by these exhibits, that the economic welfare of the United States is dependent upon our maintenance of a tariff policy which will prevent ruinous foreign competition in our domestic markets. I say ruinous foreign competition, and I shall try to tell you why I believe this competition to be ruinous.

American living standard highest in the world

We have in this country to-day, as a result of the last century of our economic development, a higher standard of living than prevails in any other country of the world. One of the most prominent features of this higher standard of living is a higher wage scale than is to be found in any other country. Generally speaking, American wages are from two to three times the wages paid in Europe and from five to ten times the wages paid in the Orient.

This is generally admitted even by the most outspoken of the critics of a policy of protective tariff who, however, counter with the claim that our higher wages and higher living standards are accompanied by a greater efficiency and, hence, a larger output on the part of our labor, which has a tendency to offset the otherwise apparent difference between the unit cost of production of American-made and of foreign-made merchandise.

I do not for a moment dispute the fact that American labor is more efficient than foreign labor. In fact, practically all of our investigations, as well as those made by the Tariff Commission, bear out the fact that the American workman is decidedly more efficient than his foreign rival. But I certainly do deny the imputations that this greater efficiency of American labor is sufficient in itself to neutralize the effect of the lower wages paid abroad. I know of no more striking illustration of this fallacy than that to be found in the investigation of the Tariff Commission of a few years back showing the cost of producing a ton of pig iron in this country and in British India.

The American iron and steel industry, I think it will be generally conceded, is one of our greatest economic developments—an industry in which we have carried almost to the limit large-scale production, machine technique, and industrial integration. It is an industry, in short, in which each unit of production reflects the most economical operation possible. It is an industry, in other words, in which it ought to be true, if it ever is, that our greater productive efficiency offsets our higher wage costs. And yet even in the case of this industry the Tariff Commission's report indicated that a ton of pig iron could be produced in British India and brought to New York for approximately $7 less than our American furnaces in the Pennsylvania area could produce a ton of pig iron and lay it down in New York.

I refer to this particular case simply as an illustration of what we find to be, with only now and then an exception, the general situation, namely, that our greater industrial efficiency and the greater efficiency of our labor, when compared with foreign labor, are not sufficient to offset the lower wages and the lower production costs which are general in foreign countries.

I know of no better plan to maintain the American wage scale and our present living standard than that enunciated in our past and present protective tariff acts. Duties are levied on imported commodities based on the difference in production costs between the American article and the similar or competitive foreign article. The flexibility clause existing in the present law should take care of variations that may arise from time to time. This protective-tariff policy goes hand in hand with our restrictive immigration law. Any other policy, it seems to me, would prove exceedingly detrimental to American labor and industry.

Conclusive evidence, I think, has been presented to you this evening that sundry imported articles, some of which are subject to the highest prevailing rates of duty, are to-day being sold on the American market at prices far below the actual cost of production of the competing American-made commodities.

Furthermore, I firmly believe that to permit more or less freedom of competition between the products of high-wage standard and high-production-cost countries and the products of low-standard and low-production-cost countries would produce a result identical with the result of Gresham's law in monetary economics—the bad would drive out the good; the cheap would drive out the dear, or at least pull it down to its own lower standard. In this statement you have my justification for my use of the term "ruinous foreign competition."

Professor Taussig in his article seems to think our present tariff rates are too high. If they are too high, just how far should they be reduced? He does not say. Of course, this is a question for the Congress to decide. However, let us see what Adam Smith has to say in The Wealth of Nations on this point.

"The case in which it may sometimes be a matter of deliberation, how far, or in what manner, it is proper to restore the free importation of foreign goods, after it has been for some time interrupted, is when particular manufactures, by means of high duties or prohibitions upon all foreign goods which can come into competition with them, have been so far extended as to employ a great multitude of hands. Humanity may in this case require that the freedom of trade should be restored only by slow gradations, and with a good deal of reserve and circumspection. Were those high duties and prohibitions taken away all at once, cheaper foreign goods of the same kind might be poured so fast into the home market as to deprive all at once many thousands of our people of their ordinary employment and means of subsistence."

Again on page 434 he states that:

"The undertaker of a great manufacture, who, by the home markets being suddenly laid open to the competition of foreigners, should be obliged to abandon his trade, would no doubt suffer very considerably. That part of his capital which had usually been employed in purchasing materials and in paying his workmen, might, without much difficulty, perhaps, find another employment. But that part of it which was fixed in workhouses and in the instruments of trade could scarce be disposed of without considerable loss. The equitable regard, therefore, to his interest requires that changes of this kind should never be introduced suddenly, but slowly, gradually, and after a very long warning."

Here is a warning to our friends who believe in free trade, from the greatest free trader of them all—Adam Smith, whose Wealth of Nations, published in 1775, gave England her free-trade philosophy and led to the abandonment of protection over a period of 40 years following the Napoleonic wars. It is also, in my opinion, a warning to those who would make precipitous reductions in the present tariff structure. Indeed, if any reduction is to be made, according to Adam Smith's theory it would have to be a gradual reduction covering a period of years.

Here again it seems to me that our theory needs consideration in the light of certain known facts and past experience. We can buy from foreign countries, and we do buy from them, in direct proportion to the consuming capacity of our people, which, of course, is wholly dependent upon their prosperity. I do not for a moment stand before you and claim that the prosperity of this country is dependent entirely upon our tariff policy. Our experience over the last two years more than demonstrates that our tariff is neither a preventive nor a panacea for internal economic crises and depressions. But this I do believe, that our country (by which, of course, I mean our industries and our workers) can not possibly prosper if forced to meet unbridled competition in our markets with foreign-made merchandise produced at costs and sold at prices below those prevailing in this country.

I have referred to the statistics of our imports under the Fordney-McCumber tariff law of 1922. That was a protective tariff enactment, and during its eight years of operation we imported into this country over $30,000,000,000 worth of foreign merchandise. During most of the life of the Fordney-McCumber law our importations were the largest in history. The enormous volume of these importations under this protective tariff law was the direct result of the prosperity of our country during the years 1922 to 1929.

Mind, if you please, I do not say this prosperity in turn was the result entirely of the Fordney-McCumber law, but again I do say this: If we had not had tariff revisions in 1921 and 1922 (as a result of which we returned to the policy of protection), the Underwood-Simmons law of 1913 would have continued in force, American industry and American labor would have had to struggle with disheartening foreign competition, and I firmly believe we would not have had seven prosperous years such as we did have until the fall of 1929.

I hope that in none of this will I seem to you to be dogmatic. I try not to be in my thoughts on our tariff problem. I have endeavored only to indicate to you how, on the basis of my experience, and by what processes of reasoning I have arrived at the stand I take with respect to our protective tariff.

I agree with Dean Donham's suggestion that we must view the series of events through which we have come and through which we must go as divided into periods, and you will doubtless remember, too, his frequent reference to the enormous economic importance of our home markets. With these references I read you a paragraph from Business Adrift, at page 95:

"Nevertheless, such a program means for this middle period comparative economic isolation with major and controlling emphasis on our great home markets. Wherever the interests of home markets are directly or indirectly involved or in conflict with foreign trade we should prefer the home markets. Our export of commodities and capital during the generation ahead should be limited to amounts which can be paid for by the rest of the world without bitter competition with the other advanced nations. Greater reliance than this on export markets would introduce a major element of instability for both labor and capital. Our first thought should be for stability at home."

This sounds logical. A generation ago you had here at Harvard a famous philosopher, William James. In the fundamental and underlying principles in James's philosophy, I have found the key to my whole tariff attitude. I leave it with you in further explanation for what I have said and what I have had to leave unsaid and in justification for what it seems to me should be our future course: "That is truth which works."

INDIAN SIGN LANGUAGE

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and in doing so to include a certain statement made by Maj. Gen. Hugh L. Scott with regard to the Indian sign language.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I have asked to extend my remarks in order to make available to those interested the address delivered by Maj. Gen. Hugh L. Scott upon the occasion of the showing of the moving talking pictures depicting the sign language of the plains Indians, last Monday evening, in the House caucus room. The caucus room with 500 seats was filled, but several Members who could not be present have since asked about the pictures and their purpose.

You will recall that these pictures were made under authorization of the Seventy-second Congress, which provided $5,000 for the purpose of preserving the Indian sign language through the instrumentality of General Scott. I introduced that bill because the sign language is fast disappearing as the old Indians of the days of the buffalo take their way to the sand hills and the happy hunting grounds. To preserve it is a duty. The idea of using the motion picture to do so before it is too late came to me while listening to Doctor Stefansson, of Arctic fame, urge upon General Scott that he set down his unique knowledge of it. This was in 1929.

The bill was passed and the money made available in 1930. The pictures shown to the Members, their families and friends last Monday are the result. They contain a statement by General Scott, historical in form; a dictionary of signs enacted by him; and the gathering of a council of 12 tribes at Fort Browning, Mont., demonstrating the use of the sign language by those whose spoken language differs to an extent making other conversation impossible.

Monday evening General Scott delivered an explanation which I here include. He went to Montana following the annihilation of Custer's command by the Sioux and Cheyennes in 1876. He was first a lieutenant in the Seventh Cavalry. He commanded the detail which gathered Custer's bones for shipment to their final resting place. He has spent fully 50 years in some sort of contact with the Indians. They know him as their friend. His study and use of their sign language have made him the one man who could make this record. He became ultimately Chief of Staff of the Armies of the United States and has lived one of the most colorful and useful military careers in American history.

The making of this permanent record of the sign language of the plains Indian is not the least of his services. No one else could have done that work so well. The dictionary, or demonstration of the individual signs, is not yet fully completed, and there must be some further appropriation to make it as complete as it could be made. But it is now a wonderfully informative record of a permanent character, which guarantees that this picturesque means of communication shall not be lost.

The address of General Scott in advance of the showing of the pictures Monday evening, February 15, 1932, was as follows:

The American Indian has been since discovery an object of intense interest and speculation. The white man has looked upon the red as a mysterious and romantic figure. He has written many books to account for the origin of the Indian, to portray his customs and nature, and to rescue many of his vocal languages from oblivion. But notwithstanding a vast amount of interest and research, it is a remarkable fact that only a few men in all our history have understood the Indian himself and his sign language; indeed, it may be said that no one has ever really understood more than the mere rudiments of this language. The sign language is still a living language in that it is still spoken by the older of the plains tribes and finds new gestures to express new ideas as they arise, such as expressions for a steel trap, alfalfa, the German ex-Kaiser, the automobile, airplane, and radio. Nevertheless, the young are not learning it and use the English taught in our schools as their means of intertribal expression. The Hon. SCOTT LEAVITT, Member of Congress from Montana, of the Indian Committee of the House, fully aware of this fact, impressed by the rapidity with which everything aboriginal is being swept away, and regretful of the disappearance of a language that has played such a high part in the West for ages, brought about the passage of an act of Congress appropriating $5,000 for the purpose of recording the sign language by sound and motion pictures before the language shall disappear forever to be no more seen, which would prove a shame on our civilization. The result of the expenditure of this appropriation will be shown here to-night by sound and motion pictures by Mr. Raymond Evans, chief of the photographic division of the Agricultural Department, and his assistants, Mr. Tooker and Mr. Ford, all of whom have taken the greatest interest in this production and have made the appropriation go far beyond what could have been accomplished in a commercial studio.

The honorable Secretary of the Interior has had supervision of the expenditures, the honorable Secretary of Agriculture and many of both departments have cooperated in the kindest way to make these pictures a success, notably the Hon. Joseph Dixon, Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Superintendents Campbell and Stone, of the Blackfoot Agency in Montana, where much of the photographic work has been accomplished and where representatives of 13 different vocal languages were gathered, each one totally ignorant of the vocal speech of all the others, in order to prove the intertribal character of the sign language, in which they all laughed and joked together until far into the night.

When we come to the examination of the sign language of the plains Indian we must approach its study, as in the investigation of every other language, in the spirit of modern research, by the inductive method, proceeding according to the laws of linguistic science; we must define what language is in general and determine whether this system of communication, composed entirely of gestures, may properly be called language; and if so, whether it should receive attention in comparison with the vocal languages. It has been well said "that he who speaks but one language knows none," since he has no means of measuring his own. We must make, therefore, a comparison with some well-known language in order to obtain a standard of measurement of the sign language; we must point out the stage of linguistic progress in which we find the sign language and assign its position in the hierarchy of the other natural evolved languages of the human race. We must describe the nature of the sign language—tell what it is; set forth the cause and method of its origin; account for its presence here and its absence there; and, just as "etymology, the historical study of individual words, is the foundation and substructure of all investigation of language;" so it is of the individual gestures of the sign language, and since it was evolved, long before the coming of the white man, by Indians for Indians.

We must look to the Indian himself for facts with which to construct a dictionary of signs, by interrogating every Indian of every tribe in the plains it is possible to reach, concerning every one of the gestures and connection with their meanings, and when the Indian fails us in this search, as he usually does, we must reconstruct the original pantomime and continue the search in the French, Spanish, and English literature as well as among the cognate terms in the vocal speech of every tribe on the Plains until the proper clue has been found. We must deduce the laws that govern the life, growth, and practical use of the sign language, collect the scanty references to be found in the French, Spanish, and English literature, which, taken with the traditions of the Indians properly interpreted, constitute all the history it is possible to obtain at this late date. Having then accounted for the origin, collected a history, and provided a dictionary with laws for the use of the signs, we may, remembering our common humanity, compare the gestures of the sign language with the roots of the dialects of our linguistic family, the Indo-European and with the Chinese, all of which are in the same primitive monosyllabic stage of language; thus proceeding from the known to the unknown we will arrive, if happily we may, at the ultimate facts of the sign language. This has all been accomplished during the past 50 years and is now in manuscript form in my possession.

We are asked here, "What is the sign language of the plains?" and what is its nature and its habitat? The sign language of the Indian of the high plains of North America is an intertribal language of ideographic gestures made with the hands, spoken in the time of its vogue on the plains of the buffalo, by means of which I have myself spoken for hours at a time with members of every tribe on the plains, from the Saskatch River of Canada to the border of old Mexico, with a greater unity of expression than the English language is spoken in Great Britain. It is a very important part of the plains culture derived from the buffalo, and is a regular conventional language that has expressions for every tribe on the plains, for all the important animals, trees, and rivers, as well as for some mountains, fish, and flowers; it has, moreover, laws that govern its life, growth, and practical use. By it an Indian is able to impart to another all the feelings of his heart; all the happenings of the plains; all the intellectual concepts his knowledge and experience permit him to entertain. To be sure, it is not adapted to a discussion of the higher mathematics, nor of abstruse questions of lofty metaphysical import, of which the Indian knew nothing and had no terms to express. But, then, our own language was no better adapted to express them when in the same primitive stage of linguistic progress.

The sign language is one of the most peculiar and interesting of all the languages of all the earth, and, if properly presented and understood, should be of vast interest to the philologist, because it is still a living language in the same primitive root stage once occupied by every member of our own linguistic family, the Indo-European, before progression to a higher stage, and its processes lie wide open to the view. During the long climb of the members of our linguistic family from the lowest to the highest stage of human speech much of their material has been changed or lost; whereas the central corps of the sign language has changed but little, if at all, since stabilization, some time before the dawn of American history, and it is one of the natural evolved languages of the human race. Born of the necessity for human intercourse, it is subject to all the general laws of linguistic science save those of sound; it makes the same appeal to the human intellect, by the same thoughts as made by the vocal tongues, the difference being that this identical appeal is made through the eye rather than through the ear. It has its own place in the hierarchy of all human speech, akin to all, through our common humanity, and if studied with these points in view would throw light upon the origin, the life, and growth of all language.

It remains now only to explain that the gestures of the sign language are not arbitrary but are based upon imitation by gesture of acts and qualities. The Indian is extremely apt in selecting outstanding attributes for imitation for the purposes of nomenclature that will differentiate their subject from all others of the same class, as will be seen in the portraying of the dictionary.

The sign language of the plains is full of poetry and lends itself to the expression of poetic and dramatic thought. The Red is a gifted race—many of its individuals are endowed with a natural talent for oratory, music, painting, and sculpture.

The sign language lends itself in a very high degree to persuasion and the portrayal of dramatic fire. If you could have been present with me in the olden time amid a crowd of armed and angry Indians, wrought to a high pitch of excitement; with war hanging over as by a single hair; the fate of the women and children of a countryside fluttering like the flame of a candle in the wind, needing only a slight extra puff to blow it out; and then have seen the excitement allayed—the women and children saved by the matchless persuasion of gesture speech. Of if you could have been seated some cold night of winter in one of the warm skin lodges, lighted by a cottonwood fire, in a village of the olden time, far out on the buffalo range or sheltered from the wind in a mountain park, when some aged historian was relating by gesture to a breathless audience his version of the legends, migrations, and trials of his people; or it may be some revered old warrior of the plains unfolding his story of war and adventure with all the grace and dramatic fire of a master, swaying his audience this way and that while rising to his climax, enacting his drama of how he struck his enemy, took his scalp and horses far north on the plains of the Saskatchewan River of Canada, or south on the Missouri, the Yellowstone, or Platte, the Arkansas or Canadian, or it may be on the staked plains of Texas or far down in old Mexico, then could you fully realize the immense value, the exceeding gracefulness, significance, and beauty of the sign language of the plains Indian.

Although the sign language has been the arbiter between peace and war and the means of the spread of intertribal culture on the plains for ages, it is rapidly dying out in the land of its birth to live only in the records of the white man, unless it should be taken up by the Boy Scouts of all countries as a means of international communication throughout the world, for which use it is better adapted than for any other; in which case it would start out again on a career of even greater usefulness than in the past, when confined only to the plains of the buffalo.

UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I dislike to hold up the House at this time of day, but I did not want to slow up proceedings during the consideration of the farm relief bill, and I would like to call this situation to the attention of the House.

The following language is contained in the bill introduced in the House of Representatives making appropriations for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, at pages 121–122:

* * * and miscellaneous expenses, $802,500, of which amount not to exceed $54,930 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office unless suitable space therefor is furnished free of rent by State, county, or local authority, or by individuals or organizations: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay any salary in any field employment office at an annual rate in excess of $2,000.

The amount submitted to the Congress by the Bureau of the Budget for the Employment Service was $820,000. The amount carried in the bill, $802,500, is a reduction of $17,500, and it is stated in the report that this amount can be saved by the elimination of rents.

The first proviso that no part of the appropriations shall be expended for the establishment or maintenance of any employment office means that after June 30, 1932, the Department of Labor, through its United States Employment Service, will not be permitted to pay rent for suitable quarters for Employment Service offices which have been maintained at various points throughout the United States for a period of 10 years or more. It is not going to be possible for the United States Employment Service to obtain suitable permanent office space in which to house its service unless they get it free of charge.

Under a special appropriation granted by the Congress in December, 1931, a proviso was included that no part of the amount could be used for the payment of rent. This has not worked any particular hardship on the Employment Service, for the communities interested in having this service during the present time of unusual unemployment have been glad to furnish without cost suitable quarters, it being understood that the establishment of the offices was on a more or less temporary basis. This is not the situation with the permanent establishment, and the original amount of $820,000 asked for should be restored to the bill.

The second proviso provides that no part of the appropriation shall be used to pay any salary in any field employment office at an annual rate in excess of $2,000.

This proviso simply means that the managers of our veterans' employment service offices will suffer a cut in pay of $400 per annum. It means that the State directors of the 48 States and the District of Columbia will suffer a cut of from $1,000 to $2,000 per annum.

All of the placement offices of the United States Employment Service are in the field service.

There is no need for either of these provisos, and they should both be stricken from the appropriation bill.

The gentlemen who are present will remember I asked Mr. BYRNS, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, here on this floor just before Christmas, when they brought in an emergency appropriation for the employment offices of the United States Department of Labor, "Is this proposition you are bringing in to provide no salary over $2,000 going to affect the other offices which have already been appropriated for by law?" and he said, "Absolutely not."

Now, this language that is being put in the Department of Labor bill next week is going to reduce everybody's salary who gets paid over $2,000 and is employed in the employment offices of the Department of Labor throughout the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. That limitation of $2,000 refers only to the employees in "field employment offices" and does not limit the State directors. There are 49 State officials whose salaries will not be disturbed at all.

Mr. CONNERY. But every one of these offices of the Department of Labor throughout the United States comes under the United States Department of Labor employment offices as well as veterans' employment offices. The gentleman will bear in mind that the veterans' employment offices can not pay over $2,000 to these men under this language. Some of them are now getting $4,000 and they are going to be cut to $2,000.

Mr. BLANTON. As before stated, the limitation of $2,000 does not apply to State directors, and this provision does not interfere with the State directors' salaries now paid, but applies only to employees in field employment offices.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; it interferes with anybody who is in charge of one of these employment offices and also cuts down the appropriation by $17,000.

Now, with what we have been having lately on unemployment we have passed reconstruction finance bills and legislation that is going to help the banks and help big business in the country, then the Appropriations Committee comes along with a proposition to take off $17,000 from the appropriation for the employment offices.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to my friend that I am not in favor of cutting any of these State directors, and there are 49 of them; but I am afraid my friend is a little too apprehensive about something that does not exist. That language clearly refers to employees in "field employment offices," and only to them.

Mr. CONNERY. This proviso means that the managers of our veterans' employment service offices will suffer a cut in pay of $400 per annum. It means that the State directors in the 48 States and in the District of Columbia will suffer a cut of from $1,000 to $2,000 per annum. All the placement offices of the United States Employment Service are in the field.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to my friend that I have in my office a list of every one of the 49 State directors and their salaries, which I will be glad to place in the RECORD at this point, so that our colleagues may see the names of the State directors, where their offices are located, and the salary each now draws. None of these are affected by the limitation the gentleman mentions.

The following is the list:

M. CONNERY. Yes; but you are cutting $17,000 off the appropriation for these offices, the purpose of which is to find employment for people. If we have anything that will get anybody a job in these days, why take off $17,000?

Mr. BLANTON. Secretary Doak, of the Labor Department, and Mr. Alpine, who directs this service, will tell the gentleman that there is no better friend in the House to this employment service than myself. I have backed them up in every instance and have fought to give them everything they need. They are doing a most valuable service to the country, and are aiding unemployment very materially. And I want to add that both Chairman BYRNS, of the Committee on Appropriations, and Chairman OLIVER, of the subcommittee, are both true and tried friends of this department and of this Employment Service and no Member here need have any apprehension whatever about any crippling of the service, as the distinguished and able chairmen I have mentioned have shown no disposition whatever in that direction.

Mr. CONNERY. I know that, and my friend from Texas will have plenty of opportunity to show his friendship when the bill comes in, because they are cutting down appropriations in the conciliation service which is established to settle strikes and labor troubles, and they have cut down other activities——

Mr. BLANTON. I will be working shoulder to shoulder with the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I predict that we will both be following Chairman BYRNS and Chairman OLIVER, for they are likewise friends to the department.

Mr. CONNERY. I thank my distinguished colleague, and he will certainly have a chance, because I am going to make a fight on all of them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then the gentleman from Massachusetts is giving notice now that he will move to correct these matters when the bill is before us?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And I shall join the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The following is a list of the offices for which rental is now paid, and the amount of annual rent paid, all of which leases expire June 30, 1932, and which $17,569 the committee thought that it could save, as these cities should do as all other cities are doing, furnish free offices in chambers of commerce or Federal buildings:

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I feel sure that all Members of the House have noticed the program of the American Legion, that great patriotic organization, to try to get jobs for people who are out of work, and I notice that the result of the first day's work was that nearly 17,000 men and women found employment as a result of the Legion's program. The other great American and patriotic organizations—the American Federation of Labor, the Association of National Advertisers, and the Legion Auxiliary—joined in this program, and I think their efforts are commendable and promise beneficial results.

As one Member of the Congress, I want to commend the good work that the American Legion and these other great organizations are doing in this respect.
